K-State surgeons successful in 1st hip replacement on alpaca

By Austin Apple
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In February, James Roush and David Anderson, both professors of clinical sciences at K-State, performed the world's first successful hip replacement on an alpaca.

Alpacas, native to South America, are members of the camel family and are becoming more widely used in the United States. Roush said.

"[Alpacas] are of growing popularity in the United States and are quite expensive individual animals," he said.

The surgery was similar to performing a total hip replacement on a large dog, Roush said. But it also was ground-breaking.

"On the other, it was anything but routine, because it hasn't been done on this species, and we knew that it had been attempted unsuccessfully elsewhere," he said. "There are enough differences in anatomy and surgical approach between dogs and alpacas to require us to make a number of decisions about changes to make during the procedure to have it end successfully."

Pet owners and people from various parts the Midwest bring their animals to K-State, Roush said.

"There are a number of specialists at K-State in both large and small animals, and in everything from surgery to radiology to oncology to internal medicine, etc.," he said. "People come here specifically to gain care for their animals beyond what a local, general, practicing veterinarian can provide."

In some cases, especially with the alpaca named Shiloh, people bring animals because of the reputation of a certain specialist, Roush said.

"Dr. Anderson is one such specialist, and he is known all over the United States as one of the most knowledgeable veterinarians in the alpaca world," he said. The variety and complexity of animals students in the College of Veterinary Medicine see helps improve their knowledge of medical and surgical therapy possibilities, Roush said.

Lindsay Franz, fourthyear student in veterinary medicine, was one of three students who helped with Shiloh's case.

"It was a privilege to work on the alpaca case," she said. "It's very rewarding, both personally and professionally, to be involved with surgeries that improve the quality of an animal's life."

Franz was part of a team responsible for caring for Shiloh.

"We did physical exams on Shiloh twice a day and were responsible for giving her medications as well as monitoring her condition throughout her two-week stay," Franz said.

The team also helped obtain radiographs of Shiloh's hip, prepare her for surgery and wait with her after surgery until she was able to stand on her own, Franz

"A major part of our role was keeping the owner informed and up to date on the condition on their animal," Franz said.

Performing surgeries on animals is a regular occurrence, Roush said. "When its a case like Shiloh, it's a unique opportunity to assist in some small way in the betterment of veterinary medicine as a whole," Franz

Parks and rec department works to rebuild trust lost after scandal

By Whitney Hodgin KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan resident Dee Robert Ross felt bewildered when city officials said thousands of dollars were missing from the Department of Parks and Recreation last year.

Ross made several visits to city commission meetings to criticize the scandal and the response to it, and to call for the resignations of more city administrators.

"There are a lot of questions that haven't been answered," he said. "I want to know why they didn't listen to the auditor's suggestions before $160,000 disappeared."

Ross's criticisms are an example of trust issues between taxpayers and city employees created by the loss of more than $160,000 from Manhattan's Parks and Recreation Department in 2004 and 2005.

Separate investigations by the Riley County Police Department and the city revealed evidence of illegal activities. The city-led internal investigation was organized to determine the amount of money lost, while RCPD's external investigation was intended to determine whether criminal charges would be filed, according to a June 2006 manage-Investigations started after internal auditing from 2001 to 2004 revealed inaccurate numbers, as well as doctored and missing receipts, said city finance director Bernie Hayen.

Hayen said not all of the missing money necessarily was stolen, since the cash boxes used on park grounds were not safely secured and frequently were moved to different locations

"When we suggested [in 2001] that they control cash registers more, they resisted and thought it was too bureaucratic," he said. "All the suggestions we made to parks and rec kept being pushed off."

Hayen said the loss would not be detrimental to the city budget, and city leaders were ready to move forward.

"All the audit information over the last five years will finally be used to create the changes that should have happened years ago," he said.

According to the report, cash associated with certain park and recreation concession operations from Twin Oaks, Anneberg Park, the ice rink, CICO Park, and pools were sources of misappropriated or unaccounted-for funds.

"I should have done a better job," said Terry DeWeese, retired director of parks and recreation. "Did we trust those who eventually let us down? Yes." Ivan Wilkinson, former superintendent of the department, resigned in February 2006 and was charged with three felonies and one misdemeanor for his involvement in the scandal. The report cited two counts of misusing public funds and one count of official misconduct, in addition to allowing city computers to be used for commercial gambling.

Videotaped evidence revealed Wilkinson taking money from cash closets and putting it into his pockets. The report also said Wilkinson instructed his subordinates to deliver concession money directly to him on several occasions, rather than following normal cashdeposit procedures.

There was no way to determine where the money went after it left the park, according to the report.

"When the supervisor was interviewed, he indicated that he did indeed receive the funds from the subordinate, and that he used the funds for city purposes, but he didn't specifically remember how," the report said.

Several city employees and Manhattan residents participated in a fantasy football league that sometimes took place inside city facilities, using city-owned computers. The management report cites no connection between the missing money and the league, but there is evidence Wilkinson held and received cash for the drafting of players.

Because city employees were violating existing policies regarding the use of city computers, an Internet watchdog product is now fully operational across all city locations with Internet access, according the management report. An interactive database also has been implemented which tracks activities within the finance department, which can be monitored by city management.

Mayor Bruce Snead said the criminal investigation soon will come to an end.

"There is a new director of parks and rec that's working to reestablish the trust and improve the performance and rebuild the reputation of the department," Snead said. "That's an ongoing effort."

Shuttle system would serve city, university better than parking garage

Whether you came for a campus visit, participated in a recruitment activity or just grew up in Manhattan, you probably remember your first visit to K-State

You followed the highway into town, growing more antsy as the number of miles following

GORGES

"Manhattan" on highway signs decreased. Finally, you entered the city and followed the Powercat-laden signs to 17th Street. (You're pretty sure you glimpsed a sign saying something about Martin Luther King Jr., but the type was so small you couldn't

Finally, standing there before you was the face of the university, the reason you came, the open-armed welcome center, still going strong after 50 years: a massive parking

Wait a minute - isn't the face of the university supposed to be the K-State Student Union?

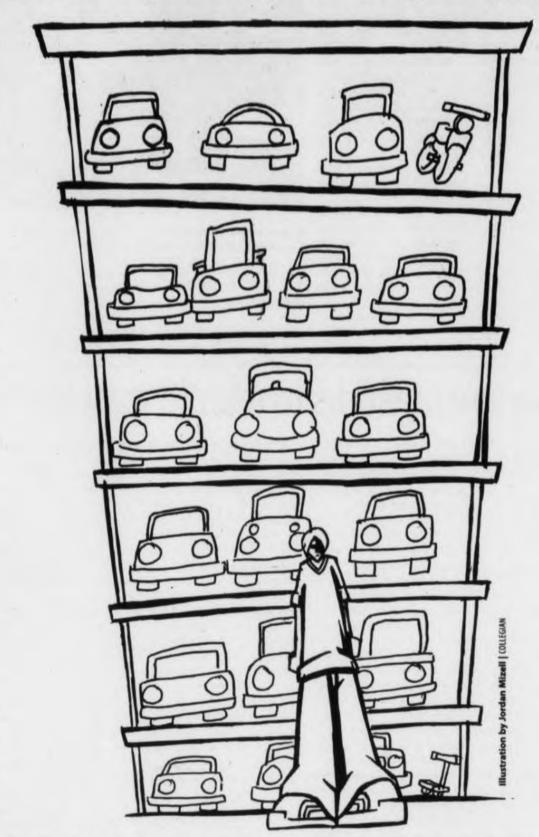

That's the general consensus. But starting in fall 2008, the campus icon no longer will be visible from the street after the university constructs a multi-million-dollar, five-story parking garage between the Union and Anderson Avenue.

The university administration apparently thinks it can disguise the garage by designing the outside to match the style of other buildings on campus. I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but there's no hiding a 1,400-stall parking garage.

You might be reminded of a certain other five-story abomination on campus. That's right, Bluemont Hall, one of the university's most recent attempts to add to the campus. Now, I haven't been here since its construction in the '80s, but I'm sure even then students were lamenting the horrible eyesore education and psychology students disdainfully call

But the garage's aesthetics and placement are trivial compared to the main problem: the overwhelming stupidity of the concept as a whole. University officials are planning to pour $17.5 million into this 1,400-stall facility, in which only 300 spots are planned to be reserved for students.

So beginning next semester, all 23,000 of us who drive to school will see our parking fees increase from $95 to $145 to accommodate the 300 students who, beginning fall 2008, are lucky enough to pay $1.50 per hour to use the facility. And that's only on the rare occasion they wake up before 5 a.m. to get a spot. Some of us even will have the joy of graduating before we have a chance to use the facility we paid for.

Bear with me: here's where the plan gets really brilliant. During the construction of the garage, set to begin this fall, the lot south of the Union will be unavailable for parking, eliminating 400 on-campus spots. The university will solve this predicament by leasing buses from local schools to operate - get this a shuttle system.

Maybe I just imagined the world was facing both global warming and an oil crisis, but a permanent shuttle system is just what this town needs to solve the massive parking conundrum (which, amazingly, hasn't prevented students from getting to class for the last 144 years until just

Creating a bus system would make getting to school easier for students who live far from campus, save students money on gas, help the environment, and - the key element - solve the parking problem.

Both the city and various student groups have submitted proposals for fully planned shuttle systems, but their efforts have been continually snubbed. This temporary solution is a slap in the face to all those who have begged and pleaded for a city or campus shuttle system for the past several years.

The university would do well to take that $17.5 million and invest in something more beneficial, like a shuttle system, increased financial aid or building upkeep.

The only apparent benefit of constructing the parking garage is that once the administration realizes what a colossal waste of space it is, we can cover it in blue painter's tape and call it the Big 12's largest piece of modern art.

It's no secret this country is drowning in voter apathy. Though still a vital function of our democracy, voting is unfortunately not viewed as an engaging experience for the average American. Perhaps we are conditioned only to respond to entertaining romps ROBIN complete with celebrities, makeovers and well-timed commercial breaks.

NELSON

So, what if politics got hip? Voter turnout for the popular TV show "American Idol" has been rivaling that of the presidential elections for some time. This has prompted many to joke that we should hold our presidential elections based on the American Idol model. What sheer brilliance.

Just picture it: we could begin with open auditions. Democrats, Republicans, your mom and that stoner from algebra class would flock to major cities and line up outside stadiums. TV cameras would pan across winding, endless lines of presidential hopefuls camped outside with only Gameboys and copies of the new Harry Potter book to occupy them. They would be weeded out until only two categories remained: the viable and the insane, ensuring the most entertaining show and thus the highest voter turnout.

For the next few weeks, America would tune in to see the sad remnants of Ryan Seacrest once again attempt to infuse a tired idea with his grating charm. He would introduce us to a panel of familiar judges, and we would watch each audition with a mixture of self-inflated criticism and deep pity. The politicians would be put through their paces by top music industry experts, pretending to have an air of knowledge on the subject.

Contestants would perform their hearts out each week, desperately trying to impress judges and audiences alike. At the end of each performance, a phone number would be provided for the audience members to send their votes. Picture Hillary cracking a pained smile and hissing, "Just text this number on the bottom of your screen!" Quite honestly, I would tune in for that sight alone.

Guest judges Ross Perot and George W. Bush would offer opinions on the performances. Bush could provide insight on ways to miraculously get elected, and Perot is the resident expert on how to fail miserably.

Eventually we would pick off contestants, scheming politician by scheming politician. Some just would not perform well enough. John McCain probably would have nude photos surface on the Internet, as that seems to be a seasonal requisite. Rudy Giuliani would try to flirt with Simon and Perot to get ahead. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama would be the favorites of everyone who attended the weekly Idol parties in your residence hall, but they would for some reason be consistently in the bottom three.

In the end, we could skyrocket voter turnout and make democracy cool again. We could select our nation's leader while eating TV dinners and cursing Ryan Seacrest as he exerts the inexorable power of the suspenseful commercial break. P. Diddy would not have to threaten us to "Vote or Die," because we would just text people into office. We could change the free world. while bored in algebra class.

Although the idea holds vast potential for amusement, the point is that we need to check our priorities. Whendid the next generic pop star become more important than the person in charge of our nation? I include myself in the ranks of those who need to stop complaining, get informed, and actually go out and vote. I guarantee that Bush has done more to change this country than Kelly Clarkson ever will.

Harsher punishments would lead to fewer DUIs

First-time offenders driving under the influence receive 48 hours of mandatory imprisonment or 100 hours of community service, according to the Kansas Department of Transportation.

They also must attend a drug and alcohol safetyeducation program and/or treatment program at their own expense.

In addition to this, they are fined $500 to $1,000, their driving privileges are suspended for 30 days and restricted for 330 days, and their vehicles could be impounded for up to one year.

Now, this should make people wary to toss back a few and turn the ignition.

However, in 2005 there were 115 fatalities involving a driver with a .08-percent or higher blood-alcohol level in Kansas.

Here in Manhattan. where Aggieville is a popular hot spot on Friday and Saturday nights, many drive home while intoxicated. This should be a rare occurrence, since a DUI conviction stays with you for the rest of your life. But since the punishment is not as harsh as it could be, people are testing their limits with drinking and driving.

Getting a DUI should not be seen as an inconvenience. We are not calling for every person close to the legal limit to get a DUI, but if you are driving and are obviously impaired, you should be pulled over. If you are a danger to yourself or others, you should go to jail. Everyone makes poor choices, but thinking about driving while under the influence should not be such a light decision.

Hopefully legislators will soon see that the numbers of drunk-driving fatalities will continue to rise as long as the punishment is seen as an annoyance rather than a consequence.

Jail and community service shouldn't be either/or. If you are putting yourself or others at risk, the punishment should be enough to make the fatality numbers decrease.

SUICIDE ATTACK IN KABUL KILLS 5, WOUNDS 38

KABUL, Afghanistan - A suicide bomber struck near a police convoy in eastern Afghanistan on Wednesday, killing five people and wounding 38 in the latest in a growing wave of Iraq-style attacks.

The attacker, described as a young man wearing a Muslim prayer cap, detonated his explosives as the last in a column of police vehicles passed in front of a bank in Khost, a city near the Pakistani border, officials and witnesses said

Four civilians and a police officer were killed, according to Gul Mohammadin Mohammadi, the provincial health chief. Nine of the 38 wounded were policemen, he said. Twelve of the injured were in critical condition.

Suicide attacks have become a key weapon for Taliban insurgents who made 2006 the bloodiest year in Afghanistan since U.S. forces drove the hard-line regime from power in late 2001. The tactic has put NATO and U.S. troops on edge, resulting in a string of deadly shootings of civilians.

CAIRO, Egypt - Egypt's judiciary chief has named the country's first female judges despite opposition from conservative Muslims, according to a decree published Wednesday.

Mukbil Shakir, the head of the Supreme Judicial Council, appointed 31 women to judge or chief judge positions in Egypt's courts, the official Middle East News Agency said, quoting Shakir's decree.

The move is expected to give a boost to President Hosni Mubarak's political and social reforms that have been widely criticized as too restricted. But others said the announcement still falls short of providing women equal opportunities.

The decree said the women, who previously were state prosecutors, passed a special test before being named to their new Women's rights advocates have been pushing for female judges for decades, but the govemment had refused, fearing angry reaction from conservative Muslims opposed to a move they consider un-Islamic.

CLASH WITH RIOT POLICE BOLSTERS ZIMBABWEANS

HARARE, Zimbabwe - A bloody weekend clash with riot police has bolstered Zimbabwe's fractured opposition, giving it a new sense of unity and strengthening determination to make this year a turning point in the drive to oust President Robert Mugabe and his authoritarian regime.

The main opposition leader, Morgan Tsvangirai, suffered a suspected skull fracture, brain injury and internal bleeding in the violence, doctors reported Wednesday. Lawyers and other activists said he was savagely beaten in police custody.

Tsvangirai, 54, told British Broadcasting Corp. in an interview from his bed in a Harare clinic that police beat him on the head, knees and back and broke his arm. He said that he "lost a lot of blood" and was given two pints.

"I think the intent was to inflict as much harm as they could," said Tsvangirai, leader of the Movement for Democratic Change.

The 73-year-old president was flown to Jordan after he collapsed Feb. 25 in Sulaimaniyah, 160 miles northeast of Baghdad, and was admitted to King Hussein Medical Center in Amman. Doctors said he suffered from exhaustion and dehydration caused by lung and sinus infections.

BRITISH LAWMAKERS APPROVE NUKE SYSTEM

LONDON - Prime Minister Tony Blair survived a rebellion by lawmakers in his own party Wednesday when Parliament approved his program to replace Britain's fleet of four nuclear-armed submarines.

Blair's proposal survived a rebellion by 95 lawmakers in his own party, making it the biggest revolt among his ranks since the Iraq war.

Overwhelming support from Conservatives assured approval of Blair's plan Wednesday, with the motion passing by a vote of 409-161. His Labour Party has a majority of 67 seats in the House of Commons.

Critics said the $40 billion program could harm efforts to stem the weapons ambitions of Iran and other countries. But before the vote, Blair told the House of Commons that the submarines - due to be phased out starting in 2022 - should be replaced to meet possible future threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists.

"I think it's right we take the decision now to begin work on replacing the Trident submarines, I think it's essential for security in an uncertain world," Blair said. "Though it is impossible to predict the future, the one thing that is certain is the unpredictability of it."

Rec's parking policy makes students pay twice

I am writing to draw attention to an issue that is both frustrating and unfair: a permit is required to park in the lots of Peters Recreation Complex before 4 p.m.

While there are a limited number of metered stalls, this still means money is coming out of our pockets to park at a building that is designed to provide a service we already are paying for.

to help maintain the rec complex, but not allowing students without a parking pass to park there before 4 p.m. effectively cuts off many people's access to what the place has to offer.

Students should be free to go to the rec whenever they please, and that means being able to park in the parking lot at any time of the day.

If students without parking permits are only going to be allowed to go to the rec half the time it is open, perhaps they should only pay half as much in fees to keep it maintained.

I'm sure there are other readers who have experienced feelings similar to my own about this issue, and I hope that this letter can, in some small way, help to bring about changes that will make the rec complex more accessible to K-State students at any time of the day.

Non-Christians form a niche in campus group

Editor,

Scott Girard - I know how you feel. When I first came to K-State in 2004, I was overwhelmed by the pressure to join Christian groups. As a non-Christian, I felt so isolated I wrote a letter to the Collegian. Twoand-a-half years later, here's an update to that letter.

In September of 2004, I got together with some of the people who responded to my letter, and we started a student group called AURA.

The Association for Understanding Religious Alternatives is a group for pagans, Wiccans, Taoists, agnostics, Unitarians or other students who practice religions that are underrepresented on campus.

We sponsor classes, social events, discussion groups and other events aimed at making

K-State a more welcoming place for non-Christian students

When I came to K-State, I felt like I'd been set adrift in a sea of Christians. In the years since then, I've learned that there are a lot more people like me out there than I'd thought. Hang in there - you are not alone.

No logic to explain NCAA's snub of K-State

Editor,

In my opinion, the Wildcats need to make a statement on the ludicrous nature of the snub delivered them by the NCAA Tournament selection committee.

There is no logical explanation for how Texas Tech is included and K-State is not. I could have lived with only three bids for the Big 12 Conference. It would have been bad, but at least defendable, as the committee would simply be making a statement as to their perception of the quality of the Big 12. I also could have lived if K-State were included and Texas Tech was not, as K-State was 10-6 to its 9-7, and absolutely throttled them in the last game they played.

What makes no sense is Texas Tech in, K-State out.

As such, I call on Huggins and the boys to boycott their exclusion from the tournament by turning down the NIT bid. Their hearts wouldn't be in it anyway. 1 know mine won't be.

Fowl issue about respect for life, not politics

Editor,

Let's, for a moment, forget about all of the PETA/animal activist stereotypes. Let's forget about writing off someone who defends animals as a crazy, liberal, tree-hugging hippie. Forget about your "people for the eating of tasty animals."

Now, ask yourself - how much does it honestly take for me to show a minimum amount of respect for animals? This is all anyone is asking for. What is so difficult about the concept of having reverence for all living things?

I am not advocating putting chickens on the same plane as humans, nor am I asking that you become a vegetarian or a member of PETA.

I am only asking that you show chickens and all living creatures respect. The events involving chickens at the K-State vs. KU basketball game displayed a lack of respect for living creatures. These events cannot, in any way, be justified rationally.

Surprise of the game

nt does not score in the final 5:09 After Catamount center Chris Holm connected on a bank shot in the lane to give his team a 57-50 lead, Vermont missed its last eight shots and committed three turnovers down the stretch. Vermont coach Mike Lonergan gave much of the credit for his team's struggles to the K-State crowd, which he called one of the classiest and loudest he has ever seen. During that period, the Wildcats used defensive pressure to create a lot of easy looks, and closed the game on a 9-0 run.

Turning point

Senior Akeem Wright's fadeaway jumper with 8:05 remaining in a game full of runs by both teams, there were almost too many turning points to count. Wright's jump shot ended a K-State drought of 5:41 without a field goal, durin which the Catamounts took a 12-point lead The shot sparked a 17-6 run to dose the game and helped the Wildcats turn up the defensive intensity that allowed them to come back.

Stat of the game

K-State's free-throw shooting percentage for the game. The Wildcats' worst showing from the line all season almost cost them in their quest for their first postseason win since 1994. Even the normally dependable David Hoskins and Cartier Martin shot just 4-of-11 combined from the line.

Game MVP

Coach Bob Huggins named Akeem Wright the MVP during the post-game press conference, and it would be hard to disagree with him. On a night when K-State's most dependable players - Cartier Martin and David Hoskins - couldn't find their offensive rhythm, Wright stepped up when the Wildcats needed him the most. He scored 12 points - eight in the second half - and his defensive pressure on Vermont's ball handlers sparked K-State's second-half comeback.

Wildcats 'get back up'after NCAA snub

Most coaches have whistles around their necks and playbooks in their pocket. The great ones, though, have life lessons tucked away in their sleeves.

Bob Huggins is a great coach. And late Sunday night, just three hours after his team learned it would be playing in the National Invitation Tournament rather than the NCAA Tournament, he pulled one out at just the right time.

As his two best players, senior Cartier Martin and junior David Hoskins, sat beside him with their heads sagging, Huggins explained how better days were ahead for the K-State basketball program. He didn't make excuses, and let's be honest - he had a perfect opportunity to make several of them. (Remember, Arkansas made the NCAA Tournament.)

Instead, he just kept repeating the same line again and again, and it was only a matter of time before Martin and Hoskins were smiling.

"You get knocked down, and you get back up," Huggins said, though regrettably, it wasn't to the tune of Chumbawamba's "Tubthumping."

"That's life. They're going to get knocked down a couple more times, if they're lucky - most people get knocked down a whole lot more than a couple. You've got to get up and go on."

Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats got back up again, taking the court for the first time since losing 57-51 to Kansas in the semifinal round of the Big 12 Championship.

Of course, that was until they got knocked back down.

Despite jumping out to an early 18-9 lead, the Wildcats found themselves trailing Vermont 51-39 with

The Wildcats had to get back up again, and they did. Senior Akeem Wright made three shots in a threeminute stretch, and soon K-State was within 57-50.

Then they shut down Vermont over the final five minutes, holding them scoreless and pulling off a 59-57 win. Fans went crazy, and one could certainly argue it was the loudest Bramlage has been all

On the surface, a win over a team from the lowly America East Conference might seem insignificant. No big deal, right?

Don't tell that to Huggins. For him, this game was a way to test his players. It was his way to find out how they'd respond to adversity. He wanted to see if they'd get back up.

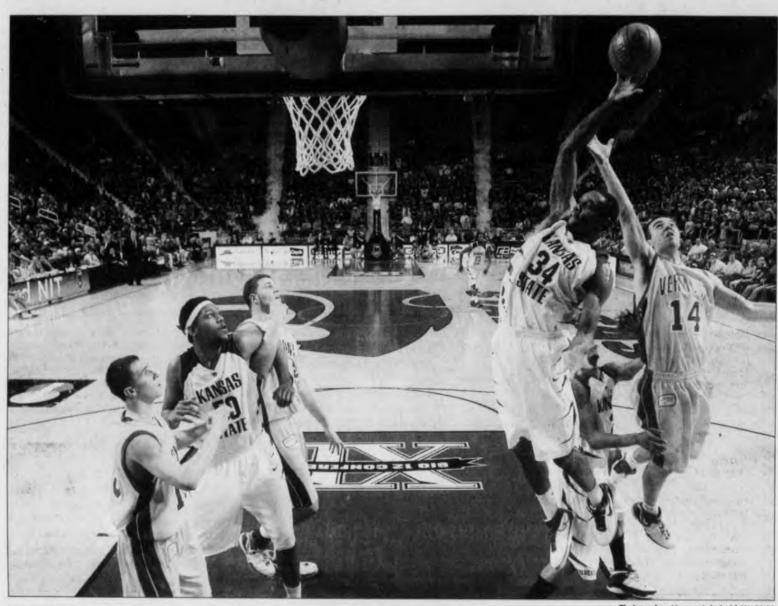

"Sunday, it was hard for us." Wright said. "But Monday, it was right back to work."

Those last five minutes, K-State really went to work. Players dived on the floor for loose balls, scrapped for rebounds and poured every last bit of energy into trying to escape with a win.

It almost seemed like they wanted it more than even Huggins, who spent much of the game barking at officials and stomping up and down the sideline. With sweat pouring through his shirt, Huggins was perhaps as intense as he's been all year. Yeah, he wanted this one. Bad.

Stayin' alive

K-State's Akeem Wright pulls in a rebound during the first half Wednesday. Wright pulled in eight rebounds and three steals to help the Wildcats. K-State will host DePaul Monday in the second round of the NIT tournament.

K-State manages 1st NIT win despite 36.8-percent shooting from foul line

By Jonathan Garten KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freshman Luis Colon didn't waste time celebrating K-State's 59-57 win over Vermont Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum. Shortly after his team's National Invitation Tournament victory, Colon emerged from the Wildcat locker room in brown and orange shorts, ball in hand.

He needed to shoot free throws. After coach Bob Huggins finished his postgame radio show, junior David Hoskins decided his stroke from the foul line also could use a little polishing. Hoskins, like Colon, was looking to erase a poor performance at the line with extra practice.

Luckily for the Wildcats, who shot 7-of-19 from the line, the Catamounts weren't able to take advantage of K-State's atrocious night from the charity stripe.

"They hit some free throws, and we didn't make any," Huggins said. "We had to score with our defense."

On a night when the Wildcats' No. 1 scoring threat, senior Cartier Martin, shot 6-of-17 from the field, K-State relied on senior Akeem Wright, the team's defensive specialist, to provide a spark offensively. Wright finished the night with 12 points, eight of which he scored in the second half, when K-State trailed by double digits.

us on a day when Cartier couldn't make a shot, Dave couldn't make a shot, Lance (Harris) couldn't make a shot," Huggins said. "You know it's nice that we can shoot it as poorly as we shot it and still be able to win"

The Wildcats also received a boost from junior Blake Young, who scored all seven of his points in the last seven minutes of the game. Young scored three of those seven on a baseline jumper to narrow Vermont's lead to 57-53 with 4:44 left in regulation.

"I was open and took it," Young said. "I hit that (shot) in practice all the time - most of the time - and I had the opportunity to shoot it. I was open and thought that I was going to hit it, and I hit it." From there, Hoskins finished off a fast-break with a dunk to cut the Catamounts' lead to two. On the next trip down the court, Young drew a foul and sunk both of his free throws to even up the score with a little more than two minutes to play

With less than a minute to play, Wright stole the ball from Vermont's

Chris Holm and passed it upcourt to Hoskins. Hoskins finished off the play and the Catamounts with a double-pump, semi-corkscrew slam. He celebrated the jam by flexing his biceps in a Herculean pose under the goal.

The dunk capped off a 20-6 run by the Wildcats. They needed it after the Catamounts went on a 23-4 run earlier in the second half.

Martin led the Wildcats with 19 points. Hoskins added 12. Vermont senior Martin Klimes led the Catamounts with 16. Holm posted a double-double with 10 points and 14 rebounds.

This was the first year the Wildcats made a postseason appearance since 1999, when K-State lost to Texas Christian 72-71 in the first round of the NIT.

Devils snap Wildcats' 5-game winning streak

The K-State baseball team's five-game winning streak came to an end Tuesday night when the Wildcats fell 9-6 to No. 18 Arizona State at Packard Stadium in Tempe, Ariz.

Despite matching the Sun Devils with nine hits, the Wildcats ultimately proved to be their own undoing. They recorded three errors and eight walks

No. 28 K-State fell behind early but battled back in the third inning and tied the game, courtesy of a two-RBI single from sophomore Byron

The Sun Devils got hot in the game's middle innings, scoring runs in the third, fourth, fifth and sixth and opening up a 9-2 lead.

K-State tried to come back again by scoring runs in each of the game's final three innings but fell short and ultimately found itself on the losing end of the deal.

Sophomore Justin Murray picked up his second loss of the season, dropping his overall record to 1-2.

At the plate, seven Wildcats recorded hits, though none went for multiple bases. Freshman Adam Muenster, senior Eli Rumler and freshman Justin Bloxom led K-State with two hits apiece.

OTTERYPICKS

Collegian picks | Staff selects teams, players to keep an eye on when filling out your NCAA Tournament bracket

Bracket busters

Oral Roberts 23-10, 12-2 MCC

The Golden Eagles proved they can hang with tough competition, beating Kansas 71-67 Nov. 15. Seniors Caleb Green and Ken Tutt form a deadly one-two combo.

Creighton 22-10, 13-5 MWC

The Bluejays own wins over Xavier and No. 11 Southern Illinois, making them the perfect candidate to bust your bracket if you pick against them.

No. 24 Winthrop 28-4, 14-0 Big South

The key to a tournament run for the Eagles is their experience. Winthrop returns most of the same team that went to the tournament last year.

Lucky to be there

21-13, 7-9 SEC

Fans of bubble teams everywhere called foul when they heard the NCAA Tournament selection committee chose the Razorbacks. Arkansas had an unimpressive conference season in a weak SEC West.

Purdue 21-11, 9-7 Big 10

The Boilermakers' tournament résumé really isn't any more impressive than several teams that vere held out of the tournament. Also, the Big 10 Conference isn't strong enough to warrant having six teams in the "Big Dance."

Illinois 23-11, 9-7 Big 10

The Fighting Illini only managed to beat one team ranked in the AP's Top 25 poll (then-No. 24 Indiana 51-43). And once again, the Big 10 really doesn't deserve six teams in the NCAA

Players to watch

Kevin Durant — Texas 25.6 PPG | 1.3 APG | 11.3 RPG

The last time a freshman phenom led a team of orange-clad underclassmen to the title game,

Carmelo Anthony and the Syracuse Orange defeated Kansas 81-78 in 2003. Durant has a chance to repeat history on his way to a NBA draft lottery pick.

Joakim Noah — Florida 21.1 PPG | 2.4 APG | 8.2 RPG

As the MVP of last year's tournament-winning team, Joakim Noah already has shown America that he can dance. If Noah can gator-clap his team to another national title, some UF students might finally get their wish to rename a campus road after him.

Tyler Hansbrough — North Carolina 18.1 PPG | 1.1 APG | 7.9 RPG

After taking an elbow to the face during North Carolina's game against Duke on March 4, North Carolina's Tyler Hansbrough has had to play with a face mask. The 6-foot-9 sophomore's scoring average has dropped from 18.8 points a game to 10. His lack of offensive production has allowed teammate Brandan Wright to take over as the Tar Heels' leading scorer. Will Hansbrough in a phantom role be enough to go all the way?

Illustration by Parker Rome | COLLEGIAN

Four teams you might see in Atlanta

Why they will win it all: With Sherron Collins and the bench, KU is one of the deepest tourney squads. Why they won't win

Why they won't win it all: While talented, North Carolina's squad gives new meaning to the term "Diaper Dandies."They are led in scoring by three freshman

No. 7 Texas A&M 25-6, 13-3 Big 12

Why they will win it all: As long as the Aggies can stay close, Mr. Clutch, Acie Law IV, can finish off any

Why they won't win

Texas A&M will have a tough road with possible games against Ohio State and Memphis.

Bracket strategies

The Speedo
This strategy is all about speed and gut instinct. No forethought, no research, just 45 seconds of furious scribbling. If your bracket is going to be a bust anyway, there's no point in poring over it for hours. On the other hand, first instincts generally are trustworthy. If the goal is pure speed, however, your Final Four usually ends up being the teams with the shortest names. BYU, VCU, USC and ODU, baby.

The Lumardi
Named after famed bracketologist loe Lunardi, this method involves exhaustive research and preparation. Allow at least 72 hours to analyze RPI, strength of schedule, common opponents and average IQ. However, be warned — when Eastern Kentucky comes out of nowhere to beat North Carolina, you'll be really, really ticked.

Mascot Picks

If you find yourself asking questions like
"Who would win if a Quaker and a Saluki went at it?" then this is the strategy for you.
Serious bracketlogists will say this method is only for grandmas and novices, but don't listen. Chances are, the winner of your bracket pool will be a mascot picker.

Hedge your bets We all know that guy who fills out 37 brackets and then says "I picked that one!" after every game. While bracket purists don't believe in filling out more than one that, you're just being obnoxious. By the way, if you're wondering how many brackets you'd have to fill out to ensure a perfect one, the answer is 18,446,744,073 ,709,551,616 (or two to the 64th power). Better get started.

Overload of online passwords creates 'digital identity crisis'

By Mandy Stark KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Corporate America is undergoing a digital identity crisis, according to results of a recent survey conducted by online security expert RSA Security Inc.

The survey of about 1,700 people showed nine out of 10 employees report frustration with managing multiple passwords. Thirty percent of respondents said they handle six to 12 passwords, and 28 percent of corporate employees manage 13 or more passwords at work.

This phenomenon is not limited to the corporate world. Even on the K-State campus, the number of passwords students, staff and faculty are required to remember is increas-

"On a day-to-day basis, I have probably 25 passwords I have to remember," said Jill Miller, department of communications systems engineer.

"And that's just for work. If you add personal ones to [the total], I have close to 50."

Working with numerous servers, Miller manages seven and logs into four more. She uses passwords for her e-ID, technical Web sites, free software-downloading sites and other assistance sites.

Students experience the same bevy of password pressures. Passwords are required for K-State e-IDs, personal e-mail accounts and Internet access. Students often have password-protected computers, online banking, and online bill and credit card payment. There also are cell phone sites, instant messaging programs and entertainment sites like Facebook.com or MySpace.

Ionathan Woulfe, senior in marketing, said he uses eight passwords daily. He said he also has passwords he uses infrequently like when paying bills online, which he only does once a month

"I get really frustrated sometimes with the amount of passwords I have to remember, especially when I forget one and have to think back to find out what combination I used for that specific site," Woulfe said.

Security issues with passwords often are the result of attempting to remember too many. Miller said.

"A lot of people end up writing passwords down because they can't remember them, which of course defeats the whole logic of creating passwords," Miller said.

Managing too many passwords leads to risky security behavior, according to the survey. Twenty-five percent of employees said they maintained a spreadsheet or document with password information. Another 22 percent admitted to recording a list on a PDA or other handheld device, Fifteen percent said they kept a paper record in their office or workspace.

Woulfe admitted he keeps a spreadsheet listing all the passwords he has ever used, with user names

But it's password protected on my computer," he said.

Kendra Stevenson, junior in civil engineering, said it is hard to keep passwords safe and try to remember them at the same time.

"I write passwords down on Post-its and sometimes leave them around," she said. "It's probably not very safe."

One risk many students, including Woulfe, struggle with is using the same password for different sites or log-ins. Woulfe uses the same five passwords and merely circulates them when he needs to change one.

Miller cautions that using the same password in all required areas is risky.

"If someone knows or can figure out your password, then they have access to everything: e-mail, bank information, all your personal files," she said.

Stevenson uses different passwords for different areas but often checks the dialogue boxes that ask if she would like her password remembered by the system to make it easier.

"I have a really hard time remembering passwords, so if the computer can do it for me, it helps me that much more," she said

Another issue Miller encounters with password security is creation.

A common tendency is to use a pet's name, a birthday or a phone number, Miller said. But often, familiar words and names are not accepted as satisfactory passwords for safety

"Things that are well known to you are often the easiest things a hacker can guess to gain access to your computer," Miller said

K-State's password requirements eliminate more than four million identifiable words, phrases and acronyms. Additionally, anyone with an e-ID must change the password every six months, and passwords cannot be reused.

One tip Miller recommends to meet password restrictions and make passwords hard to guess but easy to remember is changing the familiar name in small ways.

"If you want to use the name Daisy, you can, but you should look at it and see what letters could be changed to numbers, or vice versa, to make it harder to decipher. With Daisy, you could change the 'i' to a 1 and the 's' to a 5, which still looks like Daisy to you, but it's that much safer," Miller said.

Miller said until it is safe to use one password in all areas, taking precautions to avoid identity theft is necessary.

"Without changes in the amount of incidents of hacking and identity theft, passwords will still be necessary." Miller said. "For every technological advance we make, we just as often end up taking a step backwards in terms of making our day-to-day lives easier."

Lead poses hidden danger in home improvement, houses built before 1978

By Mandy Stark KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring brings warmer temperatures, breezy days and extra sunshine. It is also a time when homeowners traditionally bring their houses up to date with painting and other renovation projects.

Universities do the same. But in the rush to jumpstart spring cleaning, many overlook the fact that some restorations can be hazardous to people's health.

Lead poisoning is the top environmental health issue nationwide, said Tom Langer, program manager for licensing and compliance at the Kansas Department of Health and Environment

From the early 19th century through the 1940s, most premium house paints contained lead. Some companies began to eliminate lead as early as 1950. and the government banned the use of lead-based paint in However, nearly 70 percent of homes in Kansas were built before 1978, Langer said.

"If you live in a house that was constructed prior to 1960, it's almost certain that there is lead-based paint somewhere on the property," he said. "Even if the house was built from 1960 to 1978, it's still very likely."

Although lead often is associated with house paint, it also can be found in soil, dust created by indoor paint erosion and water coming through old lead, or lead-soldered, pipes.

Paint in good condition, without any sign of deterioration, poses no danger, Langer said. Lead poisoning occurs when people ingest pieces or particles of paint.

He said the two types of lead poisoning are acute and cumulative. Acute poisoning occurs when an individual is exposed to a large amount of lead at one time. Cumulative poisoning occurs when a person is exposed to a constant level of lead over

Lead poisoning can cause developmental delays, speech and language impairment, a lower IQ and kidney damage and has been associated with attention deficit disorders in children, he said. In adults, lead can be absorbed into the bloodstream and can cause internal organ or central nervous system damage or failure. Lead poisoning can be treated, Langer said, but usually by the time it is discovered, the damage has been done.

"Unfortunately, it often takes something tragic, like a child being harmed, for communities to take action," he said.

A small amount of dust can pose a serious health risk to children, who are considered poisoned if their lead level exceeds the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's maximum level of 10 micrograms per deciliter of blood.

Young children could ingest lead by getting paint chips or dust on their hands and then their hands in mouths, according to the national Consumer Product Safety Commission. The greatest danger for lead poisoning comes from paint dust. The finer the particle, the more readily it is absorbed by the human body. Langer said. He said one local concern is the renovation of old homes.

"As older properties are renovated for families, the possibility for lead poisoning goes way up," he said.

Langer said KDHE prefers to have certified individuals perform inspections to determine if lead is present, its concentration, where it is located and the condition it is in.

"We don't recommend that you buy over-the-counter leadtesting kits, because they often give false positives," he said.

"We recommend that you contact us, and we'll connect you with someone certified by the state that will do it the right

The majority of the buildings on K-State's campus have leadbased paint, said Ed Heptig, Director of Facilities Mainte-"We use safe lead-handling

"We take a lot of precautions and follow all of the Heptig said. "We've worked on enough buildings all over campus to know where most of the lead is." The greatest danger of lead exposure on campus is from exterior windows, he said.

Though the risk is high for lead poisoning in Manhattan and other areas of Kansas, the Riley County Health Department no longer keeps a trained lead assessor on staff because of the low number of cases reported in the area.

"We just didn't have enough cases to justify having someone permanently on lead assessment," said Sharon Wolff, Riley County environmental health supervisor.

If a case needs a lead assessor, Wolff said assessors from KDHE accompany her.

Drivers should consider possible legal consequences before driving drunk

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the state of Kansas, the maximum legal blood alcohol content is .08 percent. Operating a motor vehicle while above this limit can result in a driving under the influence citation.

Manhattan lawyer Richard Seaton Jr. said the police must have a legitimate reason for pulling a car over.

"You have to do something wrong in order for them to pull you over; they have to have probable cause," Seaton said.

Seaton also said the first step law enforcement officers take before issuing a DUI citation is a field sobriety test. Amy Keller, employee from Knutson Law offices, further explained this step.

"They will give you various tests to check your basic motor and mental processing," Keller said. "If you fail those steps, then chances are you are going to go to jail."

Keller said several factors influence the amount of time a person spends in jail.

Keller also said if the person fails the sobriety test, the police take away the his or her driver's license, pending another hearing.

After bail is made, another process starts in the court system. Seaton said when in court, people can be represented by their lawyer or a court-appointed attorney.

"For the first offense, there are many potential penalties," Seaton

"If you get into a wreck and no one is hurt, including yourself, you will be eligible for diversion. If you hurt anyone, including yourself, you will not be able to have your DUI diverted."

Seaton also said even if a DUI is diverted, legislation recently was passed to have DUIs remain on a person's permanent record.

DUI cases are common in Manhattan. Of the 250 to 300 cases Seaton has at one time, 25 to 40 of them involve DUIs.

Jason Southard, sophomore in open option, is a K-State student who has received a DUI.

"My wreck was the 14th of May last year," he said. "I was very drunk and driving, and I ran off the road and went into a ditch.'

Southard also said his car was airborne at one point and fell to the ground after he hit a telephone pole with the passenger side of his car.

In addition to the legal croubles he faced as a result of his accident, Southard said he also had to deal with physical injuries.

"I was in the hospital for a while, and I had to get a bunch of X-rays taken," Southard said. "I ended up not having to go to jail, because I was in the hospital for so long."

Southard also said his license was suspended, but not until re-

"I got in my wreck on May 14th, and I did not get my license suspended until the 18th of October," Southard said.

Bands' second-album efforts redefine, enhance style

"Neon Bible" ****

Album review by Eric Brown

For their second album, Arcade Fire raised the production budget, used less wit and more feeling and created 11 tracks of aggressive, relentless, gothic, bombastic, Bowielike anthems, similar to those on their previous indie-classic debut, "Funeral."

But though the albums share similarities, it seems as though "Neon Bible" is the weaker of the two.

Now, that's not to say this record isn't fantastic. It's easily one of the top-five albums released so far this year, and even if the band weren't already an indie-cult sensation, "Neon Bible" is a solid enough record that it still would create a buzz.

It's just that Arcade Fire, the seven-member, indie-music phenomenon from Montreal, made itself vulnerable to self-comparisons when it set its own bar extremely high and extremely early, letting its fresh genius shine brightly on the its first full-length album in 2004.

But while the band's follow-up album doesn't seem as consistent or complete as its debut, Arcade Fire's genius is still apparent on this alburn, especially on the second track, "Keep the Car Running," a Talking Heads-meets-David Bowie tour de

Also noteworthy on this album are the pipe-organ-driven "Intervention," the breezy pulse of "Ocean Noise," and a revved-up cover of their own tune, "No Car Go," which originally appeared in 2003 on the band's self-released EP, "Arcade Fire."

Even if the album is a slight let down from its debut, don't pass up this record. This might still be the best indie power pop/rock album you'll hear for a long time. You might even have to wait until Arcade Fire releases its third album to find something that tops it in this category. I will not dispute that Arcade Fire's follow-up to its amazing debut was an impressive effort. But there have been better second albums by other artists throughout the history of modern music. With that being said, here are what I consider to be the very best sophomore albums.

1. Van Morrison, "Astral Weeks"

Nearly 40 years after its release, "Astral Weeks" still defies categorization and floors musicians. It never sold well, but regardless, this record might possess the most beautiful and passionate memoirs of the modernmusic era.

2. Jeff Buckley, "Grace" (1994)

Hands down, this is one of the best vocal performances in rock music. Buckley's angel-on-heroin tenor has unfathomable range and power, and with the relentless, haunting music that accompanies him, it's possibly the best album of the '90s.

3. Radiohead, "The Bends" (1995) After its sub-par debut effort, "Pablo Honey," Radiohead shocked everyone with this beautiful yet eerie fusion of electro-synth rock and acoustic anthems. This record would go on to shape rock music for the second half of the '90s

4. The Band, "The Band" (1969)

This album added to The Band's reputation as the great American storytellers of late '60s rock, a reputation that started with its incredible debut, "Music From Big Pink." The music on "The Band" is simple and direct, but graceful and moving at #### the same time. 5. Marvin Gaye, "What's Going On" (1971)

After spending several years as Motown's premiere male vocalist, Gaye would venture out on his own. And with his smooth, spiritual and beautifully orchestrated second solo album, he created the greatest Motown record of all-time.

"Some Loud Thunder" **** Album review by Alex Peak

The new Clap Your Hands Say Yeah follow-up album is worth more than just a passing glance, but maybe not much more than that.

Sophomore album "Some Loud Thunder" speaks for itself. Instead of the boisterous exciting thunderstorm one might expect after hearing the first record, it is precisely just some thunder. For the most part, there's nothing electrifying here, just some humdrum rumbling.

However, the new album carries some positives.

Lead singer Alex Ounsworth's trademark bleating voice carries listeners down a familiar path. His numbing, sing-songy crooning is distinguishable and can be a proverbial comfort to Clap Your Hands fans.

Unusual or not, Clap Your Hands' new CD is like an extension of its self-titled debut. It seems like it could have been a hidden b-side compilation, not to say the new release is anything short of melodic and enjoyable. Nevertheless, the tracks seem a bit too predictable.

"Experimental," "fresh" and "uncharted" aren't exact words to describe the band's newest piece of work, but "rhythmic," "head-bopping" and "indie" are.

As seems par for the course of a Clap Your Hands album, there are some great songs, as well as a few sinkers. The nice thing about the band is its good songs usually are great from the first listen, and the not-so-good ones tend to get better the more you listen. Be sure to listen for songs like "Yankee Go Home," "Satan Said Dance," "Mama Won't You Keep Those Castles in the Air and Burning" and "Love Song No.

If you enjoyed the premiere "Clap Your Hands Say Yeah" record and could stand to listen to it on repeat for weeks at a time, then "Some Loud Thunder" will make for a great second course to its predecessor. But if you're a fair-weather fan expecting dynamite, you might want to just buy your album faves from iTunes and resist buying the whole CD.

Aggieville St. Patrick's Day celebrations to include parade, races

By Kristin Hodges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A plethora of green once again will cover Aggieville Saturday, but this time it will be to celebrate the actual St. Patrick's Day.

Abigail Crouse, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said the events will include a breakfast, a parade and Crouse said the day will begin with the always-popular Blarney Breakfast, which is sponsored by the Manhattan Arts Center.

Tess Purvis, director of marketing and programming for the arts center, said the annual breakfast will be from 7:30 to 10:30 a.m. Saturday at Kite's Bar & Grill

"It's a lot of fun," Purvis said. "It's a good way to start your day, and breakfast is the most important meal of the

The breakfast will feature green eggs and ham and other breakfast items, she said.

Tickets for the breakfast can be purchased in advance through Friday at the Manhattan Arts Center, the Dusty Bookshelf and Claflin Books and Copies.

Purvis said money from the breakfast will benefit the upkeep of the arts center. Specifically, she said money is needed for appliances like the lights and air conditioner.

Crouse said the St. Patrick's Day parade will start at 11 a.m. Parade participants will start at City Park and finish at the end of Moro Street by Varney's

For breakfast ticket information visit www.manhattanarts.org.

The parade will feature a variety of participants, including a fire truck from the Manhattan Fire Department, square dancers, elementary school students and radio stations.

"As of now, we have 75 entries," she said, "and I'm expecting a lot more."

The road races will begin after the parade at 12:30 p.m. with the two-mile fun run and walk. The 10K race will follow at 1:15 p.m., Crouse said.

She said runners can register for the race at the back of Ballard's Sporting Goods store. People wanting to sign up for the race can do so at the store the day of the event from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. The cost is $15 to walk or $20 to run.

Carman Caffey, 15, freezes in a pose as she makes her way along the parade route with other members of the Manhattan High School Thespians group during the St. Patrick's Day parade along Moro Street March 13, 2006.

Religions use sun, moon to explain world

By Austin Apple KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"For tens of thousands of years, mankind has spent many nights under the blanket of the sky," said Harald Prins, distinguished professor of anthropology.

"(People) began to see a vast array of lights come out at the moment the sun has disappeared, and they saw all kinds of configurations In the sky," he said. "People have, without television and radio to distract them, been looking at the sky for (a long time)."

People noticed certain stars were appearing first and some were disappearing last, Prins said.

"People began to see the associations between night and day," he said. "In the daytime, you have the sun, and in the nighttime, you have a very big star - the moon, which is a huge amount bigger than any of the other stars at least that was believed be, before telescopes came into existence. People began to make rankings."

Galileo was the first to use a telescope, said Bharat Ra-Ira, professor of physics.

"He saw craters and mountains on the moon and sunspots and moons of Jupiter," Ratra said. "He also saw That Venus changes its apbearance as it goes around The sun."

Ratra said scientists use celestial bodies in a variety of ways.

"We can use them for finding new phenomenon," he Said.

In the past, people have created ways of describing these phenomenon.

"People have made up stories about them because they began to see a link between the sun rising in the east and disappearing in the west," Prins said. "First, you have to figure out where (the sun) goes at night when the moon rises, and the difference between the risings of the sun in the winter as opposed to in the summer."

People began to come up with explanations of why the sun does not show up at the same spot on the horizon, and also why the moon goes through phases, he said.

"Once you begin to see a pattern, you realize that there is something going on that has some sort of reason, so then you begin to look for the pattern all across the globe and come up with explanations of why that is," Prins said.

People gave names to the sun, moon, stars and their configurations, as well as identities, he said.

"People then began to come up with mythologies in which they could explain what the function was and what that spirit was," he said. "These cycles have a marking point, and the sun and the moon identify at what point in the annual calendar you Prins said this is why people became preoccupied with celestial bodies.

"In different cultures, the association with the sun as a life giver is directly associated with the growing of the crops," Prins said. "People

Worship of the sun could be connected with the worship of a ruler, who would claim he and his wife were children of the sun, he said.

"The pharaohs in Egypt did the same thing," Prins said. "In most cultures, the sun is masculine, and the moon is feminine," he said.

Prins said a woman's menstrual cycle comes and goes like the moon.

"There is an association with the moon and womanhood," he said. "The sun is referred to as masculine because of the association of masculinity to fire and war."

To the American Indians, earth is seen as a mother and the sun as father, Prins said.

Traditionally, the Indians grew corn, squash and beans, which were referred to as the "Three Sisters."

"They are three sisters born to Mother Earth," he said, "Mother Earth is the moisture and the nutrients, and Father Sun is necessary to ripen it all."

Physically, celestial objects do not have an effect on the earth or people because of their weak gravitational force, Ratra said.

with sales tax revenue from the businesses opened in the redevelopment. The city's investment will provide $20 million.

The Final Development Agreement between Dial and the City will be considered, along with a resolution regarding the condemnation of property for the south project.

The FDA outlines a plan to acquire all of the properties within the south end redevelopment area. The plan estimates $12 million for the purchasing and relocation of all the properties, said City Clerk Gary Fees.

If Dial is unable to negotiate agreements with the property owners, the city will use eminent domain to obtain them.

The resolution declares it is necessary for the city to condemn the properties and begins proceedings on the two properties.

The condemnation process will end if an agreement is reached at any point in the process, according to city staff.

The city had planned on taking longer before making these decisions, but a law passed by the Kansas Legislature last year forced its hand. The law ends the city's ability to use eminent domain to buy property for economic development purposes on July 1.

The commission has discussed eminent domain strictly as an action of last resort, but used it against two property owners for the north redevelopment one year ago.

FICTION

Earbud Evil | The bells toll for us

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: This is the 14th segment of "Earbud Evil," a fictional story the Collegian is publishing daily until spring break. It follows Alex, a fictional K-State student, as he deals with a hidden threat to the university.

Though the names of real people will accompany made-up characters, all events are fictional. This is intended for entertainment and is not factually based.

Steven explained the situation to Wefald while Mattie and I peeled off the tape. The president took it pretty well for a man who'd just regained control after a day as a puppet.

"So, why are you releasing me now?" he asked. "Am I

We explained that he was cured, that something Lucas said had de-programmed him. The hard part was figuring out which words.

Mattie cracked open a window and repeated the miraculous sentence for all the Jayhawk zombies to hear.

"I get plenty of quail and deer," she yelled. "Coyotes, too." The crowd ran up to the windows and began smashing against the glass and screaming. A few panes were broken, and bloody hands reached through the holes and grabbed Wefald's assistant. She screamed and wrangled her way out of her jacket while we pulled her to the center of the room.

We retreated into Anderson's main hallway - which was empty, thankfully - knowing we didn't have long before the mob would get inside.

"Mattie, say 'coyote!'" I ordered.

She looked confused, and I said it again. She complied. "Lucas, what's the name of a wild animal that's like a wolf but smaller?"

He also gave a confused look, but quickly obeyed.

"Coyote," he said, and I realized the problem. Mattie was from the east coast, and though she was the daughter of two Kansans she didn't have the accent of one and pronounced it "Kai-yo-tea."

Lucas, however, was a Kansan and an ag major, and he said it the way non-urban Kansans say it: "Kai-yote." The Kansan accent was the key to breaking the spell.

I grabbed Lucas and marched him back into the office. One zombified student had made it halfway into the room. I told Lucas to say it again. He didn't hesitate.

"Coyotes!" he yelled. "Coyotes! Coyotes! Coyotes!"

The mindless crowd ceased its advance and fell to the ground. There wasn't time to stick around and explain everything. We had to cure the rest of campus.

The rest of our crew had waited for us in the hallway.

"All right everybody, we need a way to make sure everyone on campus hears the word," I said. "Ideas?"

Steven suggested the radio station, but we decided it wouldn't work because no KU-loving zombie would tune in to hear 'the Wildcat."

Mattie said we should try the campus TV station, but it was nixed because no one watches that channel, period.

Wefald pointed to the floors above us and spoke with a spark in his voice.

"The carillon," he said.

The man was right. Anderson's electronic carillon wasn't just 98 bells, but loudspeakers that amplify the sounds they make. If we could get to the microphone, we could cure anyone in the tower's massive range. It took us several minutes once we'd reached the second floor before we found the staircase that led to the carillon. I stopped when I was about 10 paces from the door; there was a light coming out of the

I crept closer to the door and peered into the crack. There was a pair of young men in there. One tall and thick, the other short and gangly.

They were whispering into a little box that was wired to the microphone. I listened closer.

"Go now and find your friends, tell them to try out the podcast," the thin one said. "Tell them it's perfect for real K-State

We'd found the puppeteers. It looked like we'd get our second and third objectives at the same time.

I whispered the find to Steven, Mattie and Lucas. We knew what we had to do.

I went in first with one baseball bat and put it into the big guy's shoulder like I was going for left field. Steven came in next with the other bat and did the same thing to the tiny guy's hands he'd done to the assistant's telephone.

The large one grabbed his arm and made a break for the door, where his groin was introduced to Mattie's knee. He staggered and fell. His partner had already been on the ground, clutching his shattered digits.

"Lucas, get in here," I said as we prepared the microphones. "You're a politician, so start talking."

Talk, he did. The student body president launched into a mindless story with only one purpose: every tenth word was

The big guy must have felt better about his pummeled privates, because he stood up and shuffled down the stairs.

"He's getting away!" Steven, master of the obvious, yelled as we ran after him.

A fist caught the fugitive square on the nose when he reached the base. He fell backward, hit his head on the floor.

"You have no idea how good that felt!" Wefald yelled from the base of the stairs, shaking the sting out of his hand.

Bakery Science Club's weekly bake sales popular with students

By Kristin Hodges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Empty shelves were the theme of the Bakery Science Club's bake sale Wednesday after most of the cookies and breads sold out within the first

Gina Remus, treasurer of the club and senior in bakery science and management, said the shelves were full of food at the beginning of the sale, but several customers flocked to buy the items, perhaps because of the nice weather.

"We haven't ran out this fast in a long time," Remus said.

What many hungry customers might not realize when buying the goods is that the cookies and bread are created after a night of hard labor.

Jesse Stinson, president of the Bakery Science Club, said club members meet Tuesday evenings before the sale in the bake lab in the basement of Shellenberger Hall to begin a long process of measuring and mixing.

"It's a lot like a research laboratory for a baking company," said Stinson, senior in bakery science and management. "We have a big oven that can hold 12 sheet pans at a time, and it has four rotating shelves."

According to the Grain Science and Industry Web site, the Bakery Science Club began in the '70s when grain science students sold fruitcakes during the Christmas holiday season.

Now, the club makes more than 100 products, according to the Web site.

Stinson said about 15 to 20 members meet weekly to do all of the baking for the Wednesday bake sales from 3 to 5 p.m. on the first floor of Shellenberger Hall. During the nights of baking, members usually are busy in the baking lab for five hours, but they have a break to eat dinner and discuss announcements.

Jabin Olds, vice president of the club, said members meet around 5 p.m. to begin baking.

"Usually we all start laying out the ingredients," he said. "First, we make a variety of cookies - chocolate chip and monster - and a third variety that changes each week. Then, we'll mix the French and Vienna dough, mold it and take it straight to the refrigerator."

Olds, senior in bakery science and management, said the bread stays in the refrigerator overnight and is baked later Wednesday morning before the sale to keep it fresh for the cus-

The bakers sometimes make a different kind of bread along with the two weekly breads, he Olds said sometimes errors occur when the group bakes, but usually it isn't anything devastating to the product.

"It seems like whenever we do whole-wheat bread, something always goes wrong - a scaling error or with the ingredients," he said.

Olds said one batch of the cookies can make about 40 dozen, and the group usually makes two-and-a-half to three batches for each bake sale.

"What we don't sell we put into our freezer and sell as dayolds for a cheaper price," Olds

He said members normally bake about half of a batch of the breads, which makes 30 to 40 loaves.

Remus said the club sometimes donates leftover bread to the Flinthills Breadbasket.

Stinson said most of the cookies are sold at $3 a dozen, while the frosted and monster cookies are $4 a dozen. The French and Vienna breads are $1.50 a loaf, and the specialty breads usually sell for $3 a loaf.

She said the sale attracts all kinds of customers.

"We have regulars that come pretty often," she said. "We get a lot of faculty, as well as students, and then people from the community."

Stinson said the money made from the sales goes to the American Society of Bakers Conference in Chicago.

The officers also go on a separate trip each year, usually during the fall semester, Stinson said.

Besides the weekly bake sale, the club has a Christmas sale in which they sell gingerbread houses, six to seven kinds of cookies and an assortment of breads, she said.

Stinson said the club also makes all of the kinds of baked goods they have made during the year for Open House.

She said underclassmen, who cannot take bakery science classes until they are juniors, can benefit from the club, because they can learn more about bakery science from the club meetings.

"When you join the club as a freshman, you learn a lot about the major and get to go to the conference in Chicago and meet all kinds of industry people," she said. "Once you're older, you can apply what you learn in the classes."

Dave Krishock, adviser of the club and instructor of grain science and industry, said members are introduced to the concepts in their bakery science classes, and then they are trained further through the club meetings, where they learn more about the ingredients, processes and errors that can

"It's a hands-on experience that is tremendously valuable to them in their future careers,"

Krishock said an advantage for the club is that the officers are those who have been a part of the club throughout their entire time at K-State, and they share their knowledge with new members.

Student dies in motorcycle accident

By Katelynn Hasler KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Caleb Eilert, a K-State student, was killed Wednesday night in a two-vehicle accident on Denison Avenue.

Eilert was a 20-yearold sophomore in biology from Andover, Kan.

The driver of the second vehicle was Judi Lazaro of Wamego. According to a Kansas Highway Patrol press release, the accident occurred at 5:14 p.m.

Eilert

Eilert was driving his motorcycle southbound on Denison Avenue and Lazaro was turning from Olympic Drive to head north on Denison Avenue. Eilert lost control of his motorcycle and slid underneath Lazaro's SUV. He was not wearing a helmet, the report said. Lazaro was uninjured.

According to the report, Eilert was taken by ambulance to Mercy Regional Health Center, where he later was pronounced dead.

Investigation into the accident is ongoing, said Lt. John Eichkorn with the Kansas Highway Patrol. The KHP does not expect to have an official report of the accident ready for about 10 days, he said.

"In cases like this the way it generally works is that once our investigation is complete and we have an official report, we then forward that report to the district attorney's office," he said.

Darrin Anderson was arrested on a Nemaha County warrant for five counts of aggravated indecent liberties with a child and one charge of criminal sodomy, Hegarty said.

"He's confined at this time," Hegarty said.

Bond for Anderson was $250,000.

The wages of war

As Iraq War reaches 4th anniversary, many voice concerns about its future

By Mike Kelly KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

March 20 will mark the four-year anniversary of U.S. troop deployment in Iraq. According to President George W. Bush, it was a military deployment that started based on a belief Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction, posing an imminent threat to the United States and world community. However, after four years of fighting, the rationale and consequences of the war remain

Whether you believe George Bush really didn't know there were weapons of mass destruction or not, or actually believed there were, it's a lot less clear-cut," said Craig Stapley, visiting associate professor in political science. "There are questions for motivation in being in Iraq."

After offering a 48-hour ultimatum to former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, Bush ordered Operation Iraqi Freedom, which, according to experts, was successful.

"The war started out very well for the United States against the tactical forces of Saddam's regime," said David Graff, associate professor of history. "The war demonstrated the tremendous tactical and operational superiority of the U.S."

On May 1, 2003, less than two months after invasion, Bush stood on the deck of the aircraft carrier USS Abraham and said major military operations had concluded. However, as of 2007, the mission has not yet been accomplished.

"The leadership that launched the war did not anticipate that the next phase would be so difficult," Graff said. "It showed a weakness in strategy at the highest level of military arts: the big-picture aspect."

Based on congressional appropriations, the Iraq war has cost the United States more than $400 billion dollars, and the cost is rising at a rate of $8.4 billion per month. Since the beginning of the Iraq War, 3,457 coalition soldiers have died, representing 19 different countries of origin. The United States has suffered the most casualties, losing 3,199 soldiers.

However, experts contend the ramifications of the Iraq war cannot be calculated simply through monetary cost and loss of life. Other issues, such as the effect on the U.S. economy and political spectrum, also have seen significant change that can be directly traced to the war.

ECONOMICS

At the inception of the war, Bush said he expected the war in Iraq to cost no more than $60 billion. In reality, the price tag has increased exponentially, causing a significant effect to the economy.

"There's surely been effects economy-wide," said Tracy Turner, assistant professor in economics.

Turner said some effects include uncertainty and increased volatility in the stock market and a surge in oil prices.

In order to fund the war, Turner said the United States had three options to choose from: raising taxes, cutting government programs and deficit spending.

"What we have done is a mix of deficit spending and cuts to other programs," Turner said.

President Bush recently proposed a $100-billion increase to fund the war, and much of that money is expected to be derived from current programs.

There are, combined in that budget, proposed cuts to social programs such as Medicare and income support programs for low-income households," Turner said.

The proposed budget cuts spending on these programs by $78 billion, which Turner notes are the very social programs that help military fami-

Turner said there is a debate in the economics profession about whether or not the deficit spending will lead to higher long-term interest rates.

"The concern is that if the government is using deficit spending to cover current expenditures, then their borrowing in markets may drive up long-term interest rates," Turner said. "It raises the question of, Who is going to pay in the long run?"

Turner said the deficit spending also might affect America's economic standing internationally. She said lower consumption levels and less productivity for the economy derived from deficit spending could lead to a drop in international standing in vears to come.

"A lot of people call that fiscally irresponsible and unsustainable, and that ultimately, at some stage, taxes

Fraternity members, leadership studies professors perform stomp dances

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in the K-State Student Union had the chance to see some professors out of their element during the lunch hour Thursday. Twenty-one professors from Leadership Studies and Programs performed a traditional stomp, an African dance, to commemorate the program's 10year anniversary. David Hildebrandt, member of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity and fifth-year student in architecture, planning and design, choreographed the stomp

"The faculty are doing it for the students as a way to say, 'thank you,' and to provide a little bit of comic relief," said Susan Scott, Leadership Studies and Programs director and faculty performer.

Five members of Alpha Phi Alpha followed the faculty stomp with a more complex stomp performance.

Clad in black pants and shirts and gold ties, the five members performed for about five minutes to a dance that included hand movements and yells.

The members of Alpha Phi Alpha, a fraternity which sponsors several philanthropic events throughout the community, were excited with the prospect of joining with leadership studies to make the stomp happen, said Brandon Clark, adviser for the fraternity.

"We're glad to help leadership studies celebrate 10 years here at Kansas State University," he said. "They came to our chapter president and let us know that they were having a celebration and told us they were interested in doing a stomp. So many of our brothers are in the leadership program and so many of our brothers are in the program. Leadership studies has taught so much to us and we just wanted to give a little bit of that back."

Stomping is a tradition that goes back to early African civilizations and is closely related to African boot dances, Clark said.

"It's not just something that we do for fun," he said. "It does have African roots to it."

"The perception of India has changed," said Varun Kumar, graduate student in biochemistry. "The India today is much different than he India 10 years ago."

The night ended with a fashion show displaying the various clothing styles from provinces across India. Several folk and festival dances accompanied the show.

"The reason why I added the dances was that the true beauty of the attire comes with the way the performer dances," said Vikas Bahirwani, organizer of the fashion show and graduate student in computer scienc-Bahirwani also said he added the dances to make sure the attendees did not get bored. He said the night went smoothly overall.

"I think everybody was pleased with the event," he said. "This was far past my expectations."

Harsh Shah, president of ISA and graduate student in industrial engineering, said the night was important for anybody who attended the lecture, but mostly for stu-

"This is very important for all the students because of what we have in this function for them," he said. "People don't know much about India and what we are doing right now."

Shah said the night also meant a lot to the Indian students at K-State. Many students in ISA dedicated a large amount of work to make it possible, he said.

"This means a lot to (the Indian students)," Shah said. "All of them feel that we need to show our culture. We need to make people understand our culture."

Commission moves forward with south redevelopment plan

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city commission unanimously approved three large steps toward making the south downtown redevelopment a reality at a special meeting Thursday evening.

The commission adopted an ordinance for the South Redevelopment Project Plan, approved the Final Development Agreement with Dial Realty and approved a resolution that begins condemnation proceedings properties redevelopment area.

The south redevelopment project is an area bounded by Fort Riley Boulevard to the south and east, Fourth Street to the west and Pierre Street to the north. Plans for the area include a theater, a 120-room hotel and conference center, a 400-stall parking garage, restaurants, retail shops and the Flint Hills Discovery Center.

The plan drew much from business criticism owners and Manhattan residents before it was voted on. Sean Weston, freshman at Manhattan High School, said it was wrong that local businesses were being displaced to make room for businesses from outside Manhattan.

"We're sending a message to these small business owners that they're not as important as these bigger companies," said Weston, the evening's Youth in Government participant, to applause from the audience.

Others criticized the plan for not being good for pedestrians and not having enough green space or enough residential space.

Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman best and what the city and the developers can afford to do.

"I've had to become more of a realist on the commission than I'd like to be," Morris-Hardeman said. "I'd like to be an idealist."

The Final Development Agreement listed responsibilities of Dial and the city. It includes which entity is responsible for parts of site preparation and construction for the redevelopment.

Dial will pay $37 million toward private projects in the development. The city is contributing $20 million, most of it for public projects, the conference center and the Discovery Center.

The city also has received $50 million in STAR bonds from the state to put toward the project.

The condemnation resolution declared necessarytousecondemnation to acquire the properties, and instructed the Director of Public Works to do a survey of the properties Dial has yet to reach agreements with to buy. The commission has discussed eminent domain strictly as an action of last resort, but it did condemn two properties for the north redevelopment project one year ago.

"This is a process that we'd like to completely avoid," said Mayor Bruce Snead.

The city planned on taking another two to four years before taking these steps, said Assistant City Manager Jason Hilgers, but a law passed by the Kansas Legislature last year forced its hand.

The law ends the city's ability to use eminent domain to buy property for economic development purposes on July

The resolution is just the first of many steps in the long, complex condemnation

City Attorney William Frost stressed that the proceedings can be stopped at any time if an agreement is reached.

Rick Kiolbasa of Dial Realty said the company made agreements this week with several property owners in the south project area.

He said he expects agreements to be made on all but two or three properties.

"I'd like to have more," Kiolbasa said. "I'd like to have agreements with everyone if I

Several business owners the plan is a compromise in the south project area between what would be the said Dial hadn't offered them enough money pay for relocating their businesses to new locations.

> Mike Conkwright, owner of Bud's Auto Service, 301 Colorado St., delivered a slide presentation to the commission that detailed his family's business and its assets. He said he would have to replace all of it if he is forced out by the redevelopment and said Dial hasn't offered him enough to pay for the relocation.

"We are holding out for our way of life," Conkwright said. "Our livelihood is at stake."

All those with vested interest in Iraq War should work toward attainable solution, not support continued polarization of now 4-year-old conflict

Tuesday, March 20, will mark four years since coalition forces' initial push into Iraq. This anniversary will be noted by the continuation of rhetoric and flame-fanning that has taken over the discussion of this world-shaping event.

As the editors of the Collegian, we recognize our limitations. There are those among us who are well read, those with analytical skills and those with solid grasps of world events. But we are, none of us, generals, nor are any of us anticipating a year away from our families in deployment. Neither are we Iraqis, Arabs or Kurds, and there is not one Muslim among the editorial staff.

It is for this reason we will not pick sides in the debate involving Iraq, for we do not believe we are in a position to make these decisions. What we will advocate, with great passion, is the end of posturing, the end of positions, the end of sound bytes and the beginnings of honest deliberations about the direction of our future involvement in the Middle East.

Secluded in Manhattan, Kan., we recognize the majority of our readers are not positioned to shape world events by themselves. But we encourage all readers to raise the voice of reason, to contact members of their governments, speak with their friends and above all, avoid believing the problem is ours or theirs to solve. As it now stands, this is a problem the world must face.

The government entrusted the now entirely forgotten Baker-Hamilton Commission (otherwise known as the Iraq Study Group), to examine Iraq and present to our president and the public a solution. While the group contained many knowledgeable members, it did not include in its membership even one member of the military. Though the group contained many notable Americans, it did not include even one citizen of Iraq.

What can we hope to accomplish if we exclude the men and women of both nations, whose very lives are the cement of our efforts?

As college students, we do not often face the realities of this conflict. Students who are current or ex-military are few, and those with close friends or family in the military are more numerous, but still in the minority. We do not face a draft, and the war does not affect our day-to-day lives.

If we choose to turn off the news and spend a day at the mall or a night at the bars, we easily could pretend this war does not exist. On our national conscience it rests somewhere below "American Idol."

Even as the soldiers of Fort Riley leave for Iraq, return and leave again, we can, if we wish, remain oblivious.

But far worse than avoidance of the situation is allowing our national leaders to use Iraq to further party lines and political campaigns. In the race to prove who is right and which policy is best, we have obscured the human lives behind these decisions.

Having committed ourselves to this course, we cannot declare it not to our liking and abandon it, but neither can the American public much longer tolerate the ebb and flow of a guerilla war and its perpetual strain on media trust, patriotism and morale. If we fail in our efforts, whatever they may be, then we will be judged as having unleashed chaos on Iraq that could take centuries to repair.

So, to annotate the anniversary of a four-year conflict, this editorial board offers no definitive answers, no easy solutions, and no strategies drawn from the public-relations swags of political parties. Instead, in this endeavor we offer only a plea to leave behind rhetoric, pride and stubbornness.

To move forward, we must quit speaking and begin to listen.

Rent costs should fit property

Back in the day, my dad went to school here. Like many of us today, he opted to live in an friends. It was a three-bedroom apartment located on North 16th Street, two blocks from campus, and cost $125 per person. He apartment with a few of his complained about how steep the rent was.

Steep? I would drool over a three-bedroom apartment for $375. If I found a two-bedroom apartment at that price, I would be ecstatic.

In today's world, my roommate and I share a decent, twobedroom apartment, semi-near campus, for $620. In its defense, it's nicely sized, has a small balcony with a beautiful view and has off-street parking.

I'm still not convinced it's worth that kind of money, though.

One night, a delightful young man vomited on the carpet in the main hallway of our building and left. The management decided not to worry about it for an entire week.

Leaving our apartment became a race against the smell, sprinting out and holding our noses until we could breathe the sweet air of the parking lot. This is what I'm paying $310 a month for.

I'm also paying $310 for a steep driveway my car can not go up when there is the slightest bit of winter precipitation. These situations, plus a few more, frustrate me.

However, I did not know true frustration until I set out to find a one bedroom place for this coming August. Not only are they scarce in this town, but they have prices that seem to mock me as I read them in the paper.

If they're somewhere in the vague vicinity of campus, they're ungodly expensive. If they're way off yonder in the vast jungle that is not campus, there are many I wouldn't want to sleep in alone.

When does it end? Too manyfactors come into play that I do ; not believe should affect rent prices as much as they do. I think rent should be based on one thing only: the apartment.

If it is a spacious, luxurious apartment, jack up the price to fit it. A smaller, more modest place? Give it a modest price. Two identical apartment buildings on different sides of town shouldn't be priced so far apart.

So what if it's not in walking distance to Aggieville. Booze-filled adventures can still be in your horizon with a quick call to SafeRide or a friend. Don't want to walk that far to campus? Go out and get some exercise; it will be good for you.

Inflation happens, and I understand that rent-like my dad had won't happen any time remotely soon. I'm just sick of shelling out a ridiculous amount of money for a place just because it is kind-of, sort-of possible to walk to campus.

Rent that is equal across the board will make the field more level for everyone. The old realestate saying "location, location, location" just doesn't fly with me. My dad might have had a sweet deal on his $125-a-month apartment, but I would settle for a decent place at a fair price.

Bonus points if it is vomit-free.

'Scrotum' has librarians, teachers in uproar

DAILY FORTY-NINER (CAL STATE-LONG BEACH)

It is not unusual to use fictional literature to help children understand the process of growing up.

Teachers use books from oncampus libraries to approach complex issues in a more subtle manner, but what happens when these books, such as "The Higher Power of Lucky," by Susan Patron, create controversy?

Due to one word, "scrotum," mentioned within the first two paragraphs of Patron's book, librarians and teachers have denounced it, and some have even refused to stock it in their libraries.

The single appearance of the word occurs when the 10-year-old heroine, Lucky, eavesdrops on an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting and hears a recovering alcoholic, Sammy, explain his lowest moment.

The story reads, "Sammy told of the day when he had drunk half a gallon of rum listening to Johnny Cash all morning in his parked '62 Cadillac, then fallen out of the car when he saw a rattlesnake on the passenger seat biting his dog, Roy, on the scrotum." The book continues to say how Lucky thought "Scrotum sounded like something green that comes up when you have the flu and cough too much. It sounded medical and secret, but also important."

All this talk about scrota brought forth debates about what is acceptable content for children's literature. "The Higher Power of Lucky," a story meant for children between the ages of nine and 11, recently was awarded the John Newbery Medal, the most distinguished medal for children's literature. Patron said she believes the controversy exists only because the word was mentioned on the first page of the book.

Patron was stunned by the objections to her book, and said she feels the whole purpose of the story has been blurred by just one word.

been blurred by just one word.
"I wanted to write an honest story that would fill readers with hope and let them see that even in a gravely flawed world, there are adults who will nurture them, adults – no matter how scruffy and unlikely – who have compassion and integrity. I wanted to give readers a book in which they, like Lucky, would find courage, love and empowerment," Patron wrote in a Los Angeles Times article.

It's nerve-wracking to see such uproar over a single passage of a word that was used properly. Many children reference private parts improperly.

Those 'who took issue with Patron's book said children will mock the usage of the term, creating an uncomfortable environment while teachers or librarians try to explain the definition of the word. However, many issues in teaching can be uncomfortable, and it is all about how one approaches the situation. Students may giggle at first, but setting boundaries in the classroom will reassure students that it is merely a matter of understanding how to refer to one's anatomy.

Health care works 'well enough to be tolerated'

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The money that gets spent on health care in this country does not get spent well," said Paul Krugman, New York Times columnist, in a lecture Thursday night in the K-State Student Union.

After an introduction by Lloyd Williams in Forum Hall, Krugman began his lecture, in which he touched on one main topic, that being health care in the United States, and his secondary points included different types of care and how the United States' health care system stacks up against other countries in the world.

Early in his speech, Krugman talked about the importance of international trade to the United States.

"Sixteen percent of our income is spent on imports," Krugman said.

He said employee-funded insurance is unraveling more quickly than businesses can handle. He continued by saying social security is doing fine and actually is doing well in respect to other parts of the government.

"Health care has not worked well, but it has worked well enough to be tolerable," Krugman said.

In the final portion of the address, Krugman spoke about universal health care and the advantages and disadvantages of the system.

After the lecture, Krugman opened up for a brief question and answer period. Questions ranged from topics like the health care systems in other countries to the number of medical schools in Travis Marfield, junior in accounting, attended the lecture to take advantage of advice he received from one of his professors.

"One of my professors told me that this lecture would be a good opportunity to learn," Marfield said.

Marfield agreed with his professor, and said he thought the lecture was informative.

There were others at the speech who were more apprehensive about what Krugman had to say.

"He had some really good points," said David States, senior in social science, "but I believe that some of the things he said were untrue."

MUGABE LASHES OUT AT WESTERN SUPPORT FOR ZIMBABWE ACTIVISTS

HARARE, Zimbabwe - A defiant, angry President Robert Mugabe on Thursday lashed out at Western support for what he called violent opposition activists and told his growing number of critics to "go hang."

The United States, Britain and other Western governments stepped up their criticism of Mugabe's hard-line rule after police cracked down on a prayer meeting organized by the opposition, arresting dozens and allegedly beating many.

In Mugabe's first public remarks since the main opposition leader said he was assaulted by police, state radio quoted the president as saying he took "great exception" to the support the West has given his opponents.

"When they criticize the government when it tries to prevent violence and punish perpetrators of that violence, we take the position that they can go hang," the British Broadcasting Corp. quoted him.

"In terms of competence for managing, planning and executing terrorist attacks, KSM was the best in al-Qaida," said Rohan Gunaratna, a terrorism expert and author of a book on al-Qaida. "That's why Osama bin Laden and other important al-Qaida leaders entrusted him with so many operations."

WNIT needs quality, not quantity

Occasionally, some things in this world make you stop and wonder, "Is this really necessary?"

Take for instance, one of my favorite scenes in, "Dodgeball: A True Underdog Story." Patches O'Houlihan, played by Rip Torn, takes over as coach of the Average Joe's Gymnasium dodgeball team. O'Houlihan, a former dodgeball star, starts one practice by throwing wrenches at all of the players and saying, "If you can dodge a wrench, you can dodge a ball!"

Peter La Fleur, played by the hilarious Vince Vaughn, responds to the crazy coaching method by asking, "Is this really necessary?"

OK, so that's a roundabout example, but that's the point I reached when I found out the K-State women's basketball team made the Women's National Invitation Tournament.

Is it really necessary to have a 48-team women's tournament for teams that weren't good enough to qualify for the NCAA Tournament? Isn't it getting a little out of hand when you start inviting teams that finished dead last in a conference?

Don't get me wrong - this is not a cheap shot at the Wildcats. They've had a rough season, and that's the last thing they need. But I think even they would agree they had a sub-par season this year - a season undeserving of any postseason tournament.

Sure, K-State won the WNIT last year, and maybe the selection committee thought the Wildcats could put it together again this season, but let's take a quick look at K-State's "tournament profile."

The Wildcats finished 12th in the Big 12 Conference and enter the WNIT - with a bye, no less - riding a six-game losing streak. They have lost 10 of their last 11 games

Wow, they must really be clicking.

After starting forward Marlies Gipson went down with a knee injury in January, the team's lack of depth really began to take a toll. In fact, K-State went just 2-12 in Gipson's absence and saw significant drops in virtually every statistical category.

So how did the Wildcats manage to qualify for the WNIT?

Six teams from the Big 12 made the NCAA Tournament, meaning six were left as possibilities for the WNIT - Missouri, Texas, Colorado, Texas Tech, Kansas and K-State. Missouri locked up a bid as the best team that didn't make the NCAA Tournament.

Since an above-.500 overall record is a requirement, Colorado, Texas Tech and Kansas were eliminated. That left Texas and K-State. The Longhorns rejected a bid after coach Jody Conradt resigned following the Big 12 tournament, which left K-State as the only remaining option.

It certainly helped that the field expanded from 40 to 48 teams this

I wish the Wildcats the best. I hope they win the whole thing again, but that's not the point. Something needs to change. When you have 112 teams playing in the women's postseason, there's a prob-

What's next? A third tournament for everybody else, just so nobody gets their feelings hurt by being left out?

Limit the field. Make it more meaningful to make the postseason.

In my mind, a 48-team WNIT is about as necessary as throwing a wrench at somebody's head.

But for now, as teams in the NCAA Tournament field chase their "one shining moment," K-State finds itself chasing something different: a trip to Madison Square Garden.

That, more than anything, appears to be K-State's primary motivation for trying to advance through the NIT. The Garden, located in New York City, is the site of the NIT's Final Four.

Widely considered to be one of the nation's most famed arenas, the Garden is home to the NBA's New York Knicks.

"Madison Square Garden, to basketball players, is the Mecca of basketball," coach Bob Huggins said. "If you get to play in Madison Square Garden, that's a heck of a deal."

There's not too much pressure to get there this year, though. That's because it won't be long before K-State finally gets the chance to make Steve Kern won a National Collegiate Wrestling Association national title, beating Steve Gerrard in a 2-0 decision Saturday.

Kern, senior in construction science and management, pinned four wrestlers to get to the championship round.

The NCWA named him an All-American, which was his fourth All-America selection. Kern is only the 14th wrestler to be rewarded with four All-America honors. K-State placed 13th as a team. Last year, the Wildcats finished 11th.

The NCWA named K-State coach Beau Tillman its coach of the year.

BBC | Wildcats drop 2ndstraight game to Sun Devils

The No. 28-ranked K-State baseball team (14-4) squandered a quality start from freshman A.J. Morris to drop its second-straight game, 6-2, Wednesday night against No. 17 Arizona State (15-7) in Tempe, Ariz.

Morris went five innings, surrendering just one run on three hits, but ultimately got the no decision when his reliever, freshman Jason Linn, fell apart in the sixth inning. Linn surrendered his first run on an RBI single by Sun Devil Petey Paramore. Then, designated hitter Kiel Roling lifted a ball over the left-field wall that initially was ruled a three-run

After a conference, however, the umpires determined the hit to be foul, and Roling was forced back into the batter's box. Two pitches later, Roling rendered the decision irrelevant by smashing a pitch over the wall in right to give his team a 5-1 lead.

The Wildcats never recovered.

Sun Devil pitcher Brian Flores went the full nine innings, throwing 142 pitches, and picked up his third victory of the year. At bat, sophomores Tyler Link and Jordan Cruz led the Wildcats with two hits apiece, and junior Derek Bunker recorded a triple.

K-State returns home this weekend for a three-game set with Central Michigan (7-7). The series will be the Wildcats' last chance to make adjustments before beginning Big 12 Conference play against Texas on March 23.

Today's game is scheduled to start at 3 p.m. at Tointon Family Stadium. Saturday's matchup will begin at 2 p.m., and Sunday's will start at 11

Junior Brad Hutt will start today for the Wildcats. Hutt has four wins in as many starts this season and carries a 1.52 ERA. Additionally, he threw a complete-game shutout in his last outing and recorded 10 strikeouts, allowing just five batters to reach base.

Sophomore Byron Wiley comes into today's matchup on a seven-game hitting streak. Bunker and senior Eli Rumler are on three-game streaks of their own.

Tennis team to face 3 teams in 5 days

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team faced two teams in one weekend previously this season. During spring break, it will face three ranked teams on the road in five days.

The Wildcats (2-6, 0-1 Big 12 Conference) will start the campaign Sunday at No. 25 Baylor (8-6, 3-1 Big 12). The Bears have four ranked players on their team, including No. 38 Zuzana Zemenova, No. 52 Zuzana Cerna, No. 67 Lenka Broosova and No. 88 Jessica Zok

The Wildcats will face No. 37 Texas Christian University (7-5, 0-0 Mountain West Conference) on Monday. TCU's team includes No. 37 Ana Cetnik. Although the Horned Frogs' ranking has gone down (they were ranked No. 26 in the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's Feb. 27 poll), two of their losses came against Baylor and No. 15 Texas A&M.

After TCU, K-State will rest until Thursday, when it will visit No. 14 Fresno State (7-2, 1-0 Western Athletic Conference). Fresno State has the No. 3 player in the country in Melanie Gloria. Also ranked individually is No. 59 Renata Kucerkova. Fresno State's two losses were against No. 22 UCLA and at No. 21 Arizona State.

"I think it will be difficult," said coach Steve Bietau. "It's a lot of tennis, and it's against an extremely high level of competition. All three of the teams were in the final 16 last year."

The last time out for the Wildcats, they dropped a 5-2 decision to No. 30 Tulsa. Junior Viviana Yrureta, who has been playing at the No. 1 singles spot all year for K-State, dropped her singles matches last weekend (6-2, 1-6, 6-4). She said she has been trying to avoid having to play catch-up after losing her first match.

"I need to get a little bit more consistent sometimes," Yrureta said. "I usually start off down, and the second set I come back. I need to start off with my intensity level high."

Sophomore Katerina Kudlackova moved up into No. 1 doubles with partner junior Olga Klimova. She also played last weekend at No. 4 singles, but was defeated by Tulsa's Thalia Diaz-Barriga (6-2, 6-

New bakery to open downtown after spring break

Local café to serve world fare, offer catering, cake services

By Timothy A. Schuler KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Edesia's, a bakery and café named for the Roman goddess of the kitchen, will be the newest addition to Manhattan's downtown.

Though the ideals will be based on the culinary arts of France, the food will be from across the world.

The café is located beneath the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery at 406 Poyntz Ave., and its grand opening will take place March 26, said owner Amy Nelson.

Nelson and her sister, Jennifer Grieshaber, said they will manage the café together, with Grieshaber baking artisan bread and pastries and Nelson focusing on coffee and customers.

The bakery's breakfast includes menu muffins. scones and croissants, some filled with chocolate or dulce de leche, a Latin American caramel. Grieshaber said she also will serve brioche, a French pastry similar to a cinnamon roll. Edesia's sign and menus feature the image of a blueberry brioche.

For lunch, Grieshaber said Edesia's will serve panini sandwiches, salads and soups. She said it also will serve a daily special entrée, usually of an ethnic origin.

"We'll do more than just cuisine," French-country Grieshaber said. "We'll do Thai, Indian, from all over."

Grieshaber, who studied at the Cooking and Hospitality Institute of Chicago for two years, said she places importance on fresh, local, natural and organic products.

"We'll also do in-season stuff whenever we can," she Edesia's will serve Zoka coffee and Maya tea, two items customers will be able buy in bulk from the café. Loaves of bread and packages of hand-decorated cookies also will be available.

The bakery also will offer catering services. Nelson said she plans to offer coffee in large take-out containers, pastries by the dozen, and custom-made wedding cakes.

Right now, the site still is under construction, but Nelson said things are going well, despite being a little scary. "This is crazy," she said, watching an electrician work on a panel the size of the entire wall. "I had no idea this

Parks and Recreation offers adult softball league sign-ups

By Kendra Stiles KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation will accept team registrations for the 2007 adult softball program until March 27 or until the leagues fill up.

Ryan McKee, recreation supervisor, said play will last from May until the end of July or the beginning of August, depending on the league

"Our softball leagues have been a very popular thing in the past," McKee said. "We usually fill up pretty fast, so if you are wanting to play, you should register as soon as possible."

Six leagues, each containing 16 teams, are offered, including men's doubleheaders on Monday, Tuesday or Thursday evenings for $400 per team; men's weekly on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday evenings for $225 per team; women's weekly on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday evenings for $300 per team; and a co-rec league on Sundays for $225 per team.

The double-header leagues have a preseason tournament, and the other leagues have playoffs at the end of the sean, McKee said.

he played softball last year and already has registered his team for this year's men's weekly league.

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Student barista shares love for coffee, passion for service, local job

By Mike Kelly KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

According to CBS news, coffee is the second most valuable commodity in the world after oil. More than half of Americans drink it every day - three to four cups each - for a total of more than 330 million cups per day.

Brittany Kuykendall fell into the world of coffee when she began looking for a job a little more than a year ago. Having never worked in the field before, Kuykendall hurriedly learned the secrets behind caramel macchiatos and flavored espressos at Radina's Coffeehouse and Bakery in Aggieville.

Located across the street from Varney's Bookstore, Radina's offers an eclectic atmosphere, mixing a consistent client base with a vibrant atmosphere, which at times includes live jazz music.

As baristas, Kuykendall and her 12 counterparts are the captains of cappuccino. Working the same weekly shifts, Kuykendall said one of the best parts of the job is establishing relationships with her customers. However, she said the relationships she has with fellow baristas is one of the reasons she has no plans to search for another job.

Kuykendall, who plans to graduate in December with a degree in sociology and a minor in anthropology, said she can't put a price on having a job she enjoys. Like many K-State students, coffee is helping Kuykendall through col-

Q: How did you end up at K-

A: I originally went to a small Baptist university in Missouri. I went there for a year just to ease myself into college, I think, and they didn't really offer my major, so I decided on K-State just because of sociology. I visited the location once, but I didn't really have ties here.

Q: Now that you're here, what do you think?

A: I love it. I love Manhattan. I'll miss it when I leave.

Q: How did you start at Radina's?

A: I've worked here for a year and a month. I've worked other jobs in the past around Manhattan, but I really needed something I like and I would stay at long-term.

A friend of mine called me who worked here at the time and said (Radina's) was taking applications, so I applied. I really enjoy coffee, and I enjoy the atmosphere - I studied here before. So I applied, got the job and I love it. It's the longest I've ever worked at one job.

Q: Tell me about the baris-

A: We have a really low turnover. I think I can speak for everyone saying that we love our job. We love the atmosphere. It's definitely like a family. If somebody leaves, it's usually because they've graduated or something like that. Some of my closest friends I've met working here, so I see them all the time outside of work.

Q: Talk about your work atmosphere.

A: It's a very comfortable atmosphere. A lot of our customers are regular customers. Since we all work the same shifts every week, we're able to know our customers and know their drinks. I've been working the Sunday morning shift for a year now, so I know the majority of the customers that come in. They don't even have to order - we just know.

You build up a relationship with them, and it is important. People come here to hang out; people come here to study. We have a really mixed client base. We don't just cater to students, and we don't just cater to the older population.

Q: What is your perfect coffee order?

A: I try and get different things every day but probably a caramel cappuccino. I would call that my staple. If I don't know what else to get, that's what I

Q: What season, summer or winter, is more enjoyable for you as a barista? A: In the summer, we have shorter hours, and Manhattan's obviously slower-moving. I like the summer because it is more laid back, but I do enjoy the winter because we have more students coming in. We're busier at night. It's more active. I see the benefit in both, but business-wise, we have stronger winters.

Q: How long did it take you to understand the world of "coffee"?

A: I'm still nowhere near having a great education in coffee, but we all start out with a week of pretty intense train-

After that, it took me about a month to be comfortable with all of the drinks up there. Obviously, it took me awhile to be comfortable making drinks, but when it comes to my knowledge about coffee, I'm still learning.

We want to know our product, and it's something I believe in. I believe in our product, and I believe in how we go about that.

FICTION

Earbud Evil | This is how the story ends

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Editor's note: This is the final segment of "Earbud Evil," a fictional story the Collegian has published daily for the last three weeks. It followed Alex, a fictional K-State student, as he dealt with a hidden threat to the university.

Though the names of real people will accompany made-up characters, all events are fictional. This is intended for entertainment and is not factually based.

See below for a message from the author.

We made Lucas keep talking all night and most of the next day to make sure there weren't any students left under Jayhawk

He looked unhappy after the first hour of babbling about coyotes, so we made a shopping run for enough beer and lozenges to last us all until noon. It worked wonders for team mo-

Mattie and Steven kept watch over the two guys we caught messing with the carillon until dawn and interrogated them off and on. They wouldn't tell us who they were or why they were here, but we found student IDs for the University of Kansas in both their wallets.

A mob of cured students and faculty started coming to Anderson that morning after they heard the perpetrators had been "Tattoo them purple!" one demanded.

"No, that's far too gentle!" shouted another. "Let's feed them to the animals at Vet-Med!"

Instead, Wefald gave KU's chancellor a phone call and they had a long conversation about what had happened, with special attention to the Jayhawks we'd captured. The president wouldn't tell us what he got out of the discussion, just to wait until football season came around.

Our prisoners were kept under lock and key until we thought of the ultimate punishment and made them work as cashiers in the Union food court.

Lucas' sister was OK. He hadn't updated his iPod in a week, so it never got infected.

All the reporters from the day before were called back to hear another announcement, one bigger than the day before. It was explained as an attempt to get the legislature's attention with sarcasm

"Clearly, they didn't get the joke," Wefald told them. "It's a shame our voters can't elect people with a sense of wit - or the wits to see this university needs help, for that matter."

The people at Computing and Numerical Services in Hale did a little investigation into how the file got onto everyone's iPods. I won't say what they did next, just that the people of Lawrence would spend the next month without Internet access.

"Well, Alex, it's been one heck of a day," Mattie said to me as we stood outside Anderson once she was done with guard duty. "I think it's time we left campus."

I said she was right, bid her farewell and watched her walk away. Something bubbled up out of me just before she went out of sight. I had to see her again.

"Hey! Mattie, wait!" I yelled and ran to catch up to her. She looked at me quizzically with her light brown eyes as I summoned what little suaveness I had.

"Is there any chance we could go out some Friday night, and well, you know, go out?" I asked.

The wind died, and the trees were still. Clocks stopped ticking. Everything in the world, save for Mattie and her contemplative face, ceased to exist. She made me think there should be a Geneva Conventions provision regarding the things women do to men.

Perfume should be listed as a nerve agent.

Flirting with a guy who's taken is like shooting at an unarmed civilian.

And anything more than a quick "yes" or "no" when asked for a date should be considered torturing a prisoner of war.

"Okay, sure, I'll go out with you," Mattie finally chirped, allowing the whole planet to start spinning once again.

She took my hand and wrote down 10 beautiful digits. "I'm leaving now to go sleep until tomorrow," Mattie said.

"Don't call me until then." A grin slowly crept across my face as I watched her walk away the second time.

Once she was out of sight and earshot, I threw my hands into the air and danced a jig that would have made my Irish ancestors disown me had they seen it.

"Good news?" Steven asked as he stepped outside.

"Well, I'm going home to hit the sack," he said. "I imagine you'll do the same?" I almost said I would, then remembered something I had to

"Nope, I have to head to the store first," I said, starting to laugh. "I need a new alarm clock."

Collegian staff, readers help make success of 'Earbud Evil' series possible

There are some people to whom I owe a big "thank you" for the fun and privilege I've had writing "Earbud Evil."

First is our editor in -chief, Megan Moser, who showed courage by allowing me to do this project. This is an industry in which trying something new can be dangerous, and it took guts for her to do this.

LOGAN C. ADAMS

Megan challenged my ability to write by having me do a new segment every day while keeping up all my duties as the Collegian's metro desk editor. It was thrilling, to say the least.

I also want to thank the Collegian's editorial board, which signed off on my little adventure and supported me the entire way.

Eileen Laux deserves a special "thank you" for reading every single chapter before it was published, leting me know if it was good enough and pointing out anything that wasn't right.

Alex Peak, Jessi Hernandez, Jacque Haag, Scott Girard, Jonas Hogg, Lacey Mackey, Heidi Paulson and everyone else who edited some chapters here and there deserve my gratitude as President Jon Wefald, outgoing student body president Lucas Maddy and Collegian photographer Steven Doll all deserve credit for being good sports about my including them in the story. My friend Katie Eads also deserves some applause for letting me name a character after her when I couldn't think of a name on my own.

Cheers as well to Nick, my botany lab instructor, who was the inspiration for Alumni Association.

Chip and a group of vertically challenged, sharp-tongued women here at the Collegian who all were rolled together. to make "the ringleader."

Finally, there are the people who together did the most to make this story a success: the readers. I can not thank them enough.

"Earbud Evil" made the "Most Popular" list on our Web site almost every day, and I heard many times that students were making sure to pick up our paper every day so they wouldn't miss a chapter.

I never have received such positive response to any piece of writing I have done before.

For your consideration, your attention and your time, I thank you.

SOCIETY

As of August 19, 2006, the United States' presence in Iraq reached 1,249 days, one day more than its involvement in World War II. Some feel the length of the war has shifted the country's willingness to support international conflict.

"The American public has become much less willing to be involved in foreign conflicts," Stapley said.

He said world popular opinion has shifted away from the United States in the past four years, as nations are less likely to work with or view the country in the same capacity as before the war.

The political spectrum also felt the effects of America's wartime sentiment, as the 2006 elections marked a significant change. The Democratic party won a majority in both houses of Congress, running on a platform that included calls of accountability for the war.

"I think it was huge, especially because you see the president's public opinion falling dramatically," Stapley said. "I think the American public wanted a change. They could see that we're not winning in Iraq, and they wanted accountability."

NOT OUR FATHERS'WAR

One of the defining characteristics of the Iraq War has been its striking differences from other significant wars in recent U.S. history.

"It's dramatically different, and I could almost spend an entire semester talking about the differences between the war," Stapley said.

World War II is considered by analysts to be the last genuinely great war, as it involved the majority of world powers and carried momentous consequences for each nation involved. Graff said in terms of both magnitude and strategy, World War II and the Iraq War are vastly different.

'That's not just comparing apples and oranges," Graff said. "Think of the most different things you can imag-

Some experts have written that the Vietnam war can be paralleled to the Iraq war because American troops are bogged down in a country and attempting to uphold a regime the U.S. government is trying to support. However, the tactics of fighting are different. Graff said Vietnam was a fight against conventional opposition, while in Iraq there is no clear enemy that can be de-

THE FUTURE

According to a CNN poll released March 13, less than half of American citizens think the United States can win the war in Iraq. This marks the first time during the war's four years a majority of Americans think victory is impossible.

There is no defined timetable for the end of a coalition troop presence in Iraq. Though members of Congress have proposed various timetables that include both immediate and gradual withdrawal in the next 18 months, the likelihood of a quick exit is unlikely.

"It won't happen. The president will veto it," Stapley

Due to its sharp ethnic divisions, many feel Iraq is slipping into a state of civil war. If a civil war were to escalate, the U.S. troop presence would increase. In January, Bush announced he would deploy another 21,500 U.S. troops to quell sectarian violence.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wes Craven and his son, Jonathan Craven, recently collaborated on the script for a remake of "The Hills Have Eyes II," which opens March 23. Wes Craven's films include "Scream," "The Nightmare on Elm Street" and the original "The Hills Have Eyes (1977)." Both Cravens recently sat down for a teleconference.

O: What was it like collaborating with your father on the script for "The Hills Have Eyes II?"

Jonathan: It was great. We only had a little time, so we just attacked it relentlessly. I've worked with partners before, but it's never been so smooth. We just locked ourself into a room for about a month and pounded out the first draft.

Q: What are the golden rules when making a horror film?

Wes: Don't kill the camera man. Actually, whenever I start a project I ask myself two questions - would I like to see it, and have I ever seen anything like it? It's a great way to keep things fresh and original.

Q: The original "The Hills Have Eyes II" (1985) featured motorcycle riders in the desert. The new film features a group of soldiers. Was there any correlation between current events and the new plot?

Wes: There was no direct correlation with the decision to use national guard troops. It wasn't political. It's just interesting to watch American kids put in situations they aren't necessarily trained for. They have to improvise their defense.

Jonathan: It came about organically. The first movie took place on a military base, so it's logical that soldiers would end up there.

Q: It's unusual for a remake to have the same writer as the original. How did that come about?

Wes: We approached it as a sequel to the 2006 film, not necessarily a remake of the original sequel. The 2006 film is still fresh in the minds of the audience - that's what we assumed while writing.

Q: What are your favorite horror films of all time?

Wes: The obvious choices would be "The Exorcist" or "Alien," but I'd say my current favorite is "Children of Men." Most people wouldn't classify it as a horror film, but it really hits on the horrors of the future. The original "Texas Chainsaw Massacre" was great, too.

Q: What is your opinion of modern horror films?

Wes: It's nice to see horror moving past the PG-13 stage and the Japanese remake stage. People tried to play it safe after 9/11. We're finally getting back to hard-hitting, bareknuckled horror films.

Q: What was it like shooting the film in Morocco?

Jonathan: It was beautiful. We found a lot of jagged, rocky, ominous hills. There was a guy who came an hour early to pluck poisonous snakes out of the caves. He kept them all in a cardboard box and sold them to local snake charmers every night. It was a short, quick shoot, and we had people from about 23 countries working on the film.

Q: What can you tell us about the new Freddy Krueger film?

Wes: That character haunts me in every interview I do. I know nothing about the new film. I was penniless after the first film, and I actually sold my rights to the character.

Q: What is one project you would love to do but haven't been able to yet?

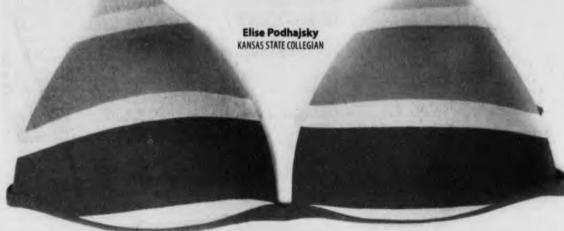

Wes: I'd love to make a movie about the Donald Trump story. I might give him some kind of weapon, but I'd probably just have him kill people with his hair.

Make it fit

Look your best for spring break with swimsuits that flatter your figure

I pring break is right around the corner, which can only mean one thing: swimsuit season.

OK, I know what you're thinking. Right now, hitting the beach in your mother's tacky holiday sweater sounds more appealing than making your grand entrance to South Padre in a teeny-weenie, polkadot bikini.

Not to worry, though, the secret to looking and feeling great this spring break is not what's hot on the runways but what's hot on you.

So find the body type below that suits you, pick up a few tips and tricks for looking your best in the sun, and enter the fitting rooms this season armed with confidence rather than a Kleenex box.

And remember, the ideal body type for you is the one you already have.

1: INVERTED TRIANGLE OR APPLE-SHAPE

Description: Your shoulders are broader than your waistline and hips and/or you have a fuller

Choose swimwear that will draw attention down from your upper-half. Try high necklines with a square cut to give the illusion of narrower shoulders or a crossover or draping style to help minimize

Look for hidden support from an underwire or high-content lycra suits. The support should be for the bust as well as the sides of your top.

Tankinis and halter-cuts are great options for inverted triangles. A solid top with printed bottoms also can help draw attention downward.

2: ATHLETIC/BOYISH OR RECTANGLE

Description: Your shoulders, waistline and hips are all about equal in width with little or not

For this body type, you'll want to choose a suit that creates curves — try a belted bottom.

Look for suits with feminine detailing like bows or flirty ties around the waist and hips. These help create visual curves. Also, deep-plunge fronts create space between cups, distracting from smaller chests. Suits with aqua-padding — a new trend this season — can help with this as well.

3: PLUS-SIZE OR CIRCLE

Description: Most of your weight is focused at

For this body type, try a one-piece suit with detailing around the top or a V-neckline that draws the eye upward. Shirred fabric around the waist and suits containing a high-lycra content work well for this shape. High-cut legs also make your entire body appear longer.

Stick to dark colors and small patterns polka dots are in style.

4: TRIANGLE OR PEAR-SHAPED

Description: Your hips and waist are larger than your shoulders.

Swimsuits with color blocking are great a dark color on the bottom with a lighter color on top draw attention to the bust and shoulders.

When choosing a one-piece, try a boat-neck or racer-back cut to create the illusion of a more balanced figure. If you choose a two-piece, make sure your bottom sits well on your hips and is at least one shade darker than

5: HOURGLASS SHAPE

Description: A well-defined waist with shoulders and bust proportional to Look for a swimsuit that will show off your curves. Try a suit with all-over prints and patterns that will keep the eye busy or accentuate your waistline. Two-piece and one-piece styles work well for this figure; and cut-out, one-piece suits still are a hot trend this season.

'300' provides testosteronefueled fun

Film review by Brendan Praeger

Film adaptations can be tricky. The only conversation more boring than a generic"the movie wasn't faithful to the book" argument is a snobby "the movie wasn't historically accurate" argument.

'300," based on the ancient battle of Thermopylae, faces dual challenges. Not only does it attempt to please the average moviegoer, it also shoots for the admiration of Frank Miller fans. It faces the deafening hype of a relentless advertising campaign, as well as unavoidable comparisons to "Sin City," the most recent adaptation of a Frank Miller graphic novel. As far as historical accuracy, director Zack Snyder follows up his fantastic remake of "Dawn of the Dead" by taking the best approach possible with an action film — he casts it aside.

The result is a film that overcomes its multiple shortcomings effortlessly. This isn't a film that aspires to an Academy Award-winning level of grace, but lackluster character development and a one-dimensional story line are completely forgotten when buried underneath buckets of gratuitous blood and a badass rating that clocks in somewhere between "Die Hard" and the first time you performed a fatality in "Mortal Kombat."

The plot thrives on its simplicity. Greece is under attack. Three hundred Spartan warriors hold off of thousands of Persian soldiers by funneling them into a narrow canyon. It's a battle of few against many, free men against slaves.

The only true subplot involves the Queen Gorgo of Sparta (Lena Headey), a defiant character who replies to a Persian messenger's insult by saying, "only Spartan women give birth to true men." Her story provides the quota of female nudity required for a mindless action film, as well as a welcome breather from the intense battle scenes that dominate the film

Much like "Sin City," most of the scenery in "300" is computer animated. The backgrounds, while elaborate, are rarely distracting, which keeps the focus on the characters and action instead.

The film isn't necessarily historically accurate, but it shouldn't be — it isn't a documentary. It walks the fine line between realism and fantasy. I know there probably wasn't a rhinoceros cavalry or a 9-foot-tall executioner with blades for arms, but the film stayed close enough to reality to avoid the complete suspension of disbelief. No character is invincible, and the film implies the presence of the gods but doesn't specifically show it. The Spartans' limited success against seemingly impossible odds makes logical and visual sense.

"300" isn't a masterpiece on the level of "The Godfather" or "The Shawshank Redemption." It isn't supposed to be. It's a movie that nails its target audience square in the chest with extra doses of testosterone and inspiration. This is a film that high-school students can watch before football games, soldiers can watch before battle and most importantly, any group of men can watch while congregating around a ceremonial offering of beer and meat, communicating only in grunts and unnecessary profanity.

KSU student apparent victim of shooting

By Megan Moser KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three college students who were robbed and wounded Sunday in a parking lot in Denver are expected to survive, according to a story by the Denver Post. One of the victims might be a K-State student.

Though officials did not release the names and hometowns of the victims, the Collegian received early information from a female roommate of one of the victims.

She said the man was a psychology major at K-State. After initially providing her name and the victim's first name, she asked they be withheld, offering to provide the Collegian additional information once the victim's parents gave their approval.

Because the Collegian did not have a last name for the student, reporters were not able to contact his family or get any further information.

Officials confirmed the other victims do not attend college in the state of Colorado.

Vikki Migoya, nighttime editor for the Denver Post, said at 10:30 p.m. Sunday no other information about the victims had been released

"Nobody in Denver that I know of has any names at this time," she said.

Migoya said a police spokeswoman told the Denver Post that the students had gone to a concert at Cervantes' Masterpiece Ballroom in the historic five points district of Denver to watch the band Zilla, a trance band started by a member of the String Cheese Incident.

They were robbed and shot in a parking lot adjacent to a light rail station at 25th and Welton streets at about 5 a.m. Sunday, according to a report on the Colorado 9 News station Web site. The light rail station closed down for about four hours after the incident.

According to an early edition of the Denver Post story Migoya sent to the Collegian via e-mail, the victims were seriously wounded with a small-caliber revolver even though they complied with the assailants' request to give up their wallets.

One victim was shot in the back, one in the neck and one in the chest. They were taken to Denver Health Medical Center and were listed in stable condition.

Two men "wearing dark clothing and black or gray ski masks with eye and mouth holes" were responsible for the crime, according to the story.

Police were unable to find the men but are investigating possible connections to two other shootings in the area. Other Web sites, including CBS 4 Denver, Summit Daily News and The Associated Press, corroborated the Denver Post ac-

Calls to the Denver Police Department were not returned.

Trips take students across country, from San Francisco to Virginia

As Collegian editors searched for ways to cover students' spring break adventures, we kept running into a problem. Each of us was already going to be out of town, vacationing in some fantastic locale.

As such, we have brought you firsthand accounts of a few of our spring break experiences.

BAHAMAS

If you never have been on a cruise, I recommend it. For my spring break, I hit the seas with my girlfriend Jessica Durham, senior in print journalism, and friends Kyle Martinek, freshman in journalism and mass communications, and Alex Yocum, junior in marketing. We stopped in the Bahamas, CocoCay and Key West along the

My trip started with a six-hour drive to St. Louis to fly to Miami. We spent a night in Miami and left for the Bahamas on Monday morning.

On the first day at sea, we traveled through the night, arriving in the Bahamas early Tuesday. While in the Bahamas, we took a boat to see the Atlantis hotel. After hours of touring the hotel in awe and being denied access to every cool place there, my friends and I took the small boat back and shopped the rest of the afternoon.

On the second day, we were to stop at CocoCay, a private island owned by Royal Caribbean, but winds were too strong to take a smaller boat to the island, so we spent the day at sea instead. During the time on the ship, we enjoyed the wonderful food on board and competed in the pool olympics with other spring breakers. We won the silver medal.

On the last day at sea, we arrived in Key West. While there, I went parasailing and walked across the entire island. I visited the southernmost point of the continental United States and enjoyed a piece of Key Lime pie at a small coffee shop off of Duval

The trip ended Friday morning, arriving back in Miami and flying back to St. Louis. The fun didn't stop there. We drove back from St. Louis to Manhattan to be greeted by lightning and thunderstorms.

We all wished we were back in the Bahamas

SAN FRANCISCO

When I think of San Francisco, I picture the typical gay couple, Birkenstocks, trolleys and Asians. For spring break, what I witnessed was a load of hipsters, mass transits and drugs.

Early Sunday morning, my good friend and I left the Midwest behind with our luggage and naïvety in tow.

Past experiences in California aside, I was not prepared for the culture shock ahead. Fortunately, we had my friend's two twenty-something-year-old trendy sisters as our tour guides.

The first major whammy: public transportation. Apparently, I'm quite spoiled with my own vehicle. While different modes of transportation aren't a new concept for me, taking two or three trains, a subway, multiple buses, ferries, airplanes and cabs all in a span of 24 hours is.

The second: hipsters and drugs. Perhaps it was the person rolling and lighting a joint in the middle of the sidewalk on Haight Street or the abundance of lop-sided haircuts and mod outfits, but mostly, I think it was

Memorial honors members of the military who died in Iraq War

By Ben Hedges

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students walking around campus this week may notice thousands of small yellow flags lining the walkways in the quad area near Hale Library.

On each flag is the name, age and birthplace of every person in the U.S. military who has died in the Iraq War to date.

The flags are a part of a memorial created by the K-State and Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice.

"I want to stress that this isn't an anti-war protest," said Jeff Stilley, president of the K-State alliance. "We just want people to remember that we are still at war."

Stilley, senior in secondary education, said his uncle created a similar memorial in Colorado on a high school football field and thought it would be a great idea for K-State.

The group has been working on the memorial for nearly a month and have set up 3,494 flags, one for every man and woman killed in action in Iraq.

"We wanted to display the names of soldiers that died," said Megan Bindel, junior in biology and geography, "but we also want people to visualize how many of them died."

Bindel said the information was gathered from the Web site icasualties.org, an independent site that documents the casualties of Iraq and Afghanistan, including the wounded.

Alissa Vining, senior in creative writing, said she hoped students would see how costly the war has "Hopefully, it just puts things into perspective for students." Vining said.

Mark Ruzicka, senior in landscape architecture, puts down one of 3,494 flags along the sidewalk in the quad area in front of Waters Hall. Members of the K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice marked a flag for every U.S. soldier lost in Iraq. Each flag had the name, age and hometown of a soldier written on it.

Stilley said the flags will remain until Friday and also said the alliance will have tables with information set up in the Bosco Student Plaza outside the K-State Student Union.

BROTHEL OFFERS DISCOUNT ON SEX TO PENSIONERS

BERLIN, Germany - A brothel in Germany hopes to capitalize on the growing number of pensioners by offering them a 50 percent discount for sex in the

The "Pascha" in the western city of Cologne has introduced reduced rates for sessions for clients aged 66 and above - provided they prove their age.

"All clients need to do is show us some proof of age," said Armin Lobscheid, spokesperson for the brothel's managing director. "A 'normal session' costs 50 euros with us - and we're now paying 50 percent of that for these older guests."

After testing the water with reductions for senior citizens once a week, the Pascha decided earlier this month to offer 50 percent off sex services between midday and 5 p.m. every day.

"There's been plenty of demand and people have certainly been taking advantage of the offer," the spokesperson said. "Older folks are more active than you think."

CHURCH HONORS MEMORY OF 'MODEL MEMBER'TURKEY

WALES TOWNSHIP, Michigan - A church was planning a Sunday moment of silence for what the pastor called a model member of his congregation: a wild turkey.

The turkey, which died last week after being hit by a car, regularly attended Sunday services and greeted people as they arrived, said the Rev. James Huff, pastor of Lambs United Methodist Church in St. Clair County.

"He would kind of wait for me to come in," Huff told the Times Herald of Port Huron. "He knew when I got there. Service was about to begin, and then he would sit on one lady's car until we were done."

The animal had been hanging around since late last year and quickly became known for its fearless attitude.

"We've got so many pictures of it," said Douglas Bishop, the church's music director. "It was like our mascot!

SARATOGA'S MINERAL BATHS DILUTED WITH TAP WATER

SARATOGA SPRINGS, New York - The famed "natural mineral water" baths at Saratoga Spa State Park have been diluted with regular tap water for the past two decades, state officials confirmed Monday.

The park's baths attract about 14,000 customers a year who pay $20 for the privilege of soaking in the bubbly water.

"I thought I was bathing in pure mineral water," Kristina Weilbacher, 22, of San Antonio, Texas, told the New York Post, which first reported the situation. "I definitely should have been

The state and the company that operates the baths, Xanterra Parks & Resorts, mix heated public drinking water with the chilly carbonated mineral water pumped up from more than 1,000 feet below the surface, according to the newspaper.

Larrabee said it was not immediately clear why the mixing started. The Post said it began when a mineral water heater used by the park since the '30s broke down.

13-YEAR-OLD GIRL NAMED ROTTEN SNEAKERS QUEEN

MONTPELIER, Vermont Thirteen-year-old Katharine Tuck's sneakers smell as bad as they look. Now, at least, the Utah seventh-grader can afford some new ones.

On Tuesday, she outranked six other children to win $2,500 in the 32nd annual National Odor-Eaters Rotten Sneaker Contest, stinking up the joint with a pair of well-worn 11/2-year-old Nikes so noxious they had the judges wincing.

"I'm so proud of the little stinker," said her mother, Paula Ah, the foul smell of success. Katharine has used the sneakers to play soccer and basketball, hiked in them, even waded into the Great Salt Lake, where they were infiltrated by brine shrimp.

The contest, founded in 1975 as a sporting goods store promotion and now sponsored by the manufacturer of anti-foot odor products, pits children from around the United States who have won state-level competitions for the generally cruddy condition of their footwear.

Michael Nduka, 9, of White Plains, New York, sported ratty black-and-white low-cuts, which were passed from judge to judge for inspection.

Judge William Fraser held one up using the tip of a pen.

Contestants had to jump in place once and make one full turn in place before taking off their shoes and handing them to the judges. It was 24 degrees outside, but only one of the kids wore socks - foot sweat is a boon, not a bane, in this game.

Katharine and her father missed a connecting flight and had to drive part of the way to Vermont. Their luggage still had not arrived Tuesday. Her mother had the foresight to warn her not to ship her prized shoes in her checked baggage. Mercifully for airport security screeners, she did not wear them, either, opting to carry them in her purse.

TOWN OFFERS FREE LAND TO ALASKA 'HOMESTEADERS' ANCHORAGE, Alaska

- Anderson, a little town in Alaska's interior, has no gas station, no grocery store and no traffic lights, but it does have plenty of woodsy land - and it's free to anyone willing to put down roots in the often-frozen ground.

In a modern twist on the homesteading movement that populated the Plains in the 1800s, the community of 300 people is offering 26 large lots on spruce-covered land in a part of Alaska that has spectacular views of the Northern lights and Mount McKinley, North America's highest peak.

The 1.3-acre lots will be awarded to the first people who apply for them and submit $500 refundable deposits beginning at 9 a.m. Monday.

Each winning applicant must build a house measuring at least 1,000 square feet within two years. Power and phone hookups are now available.

Manhattan 'fairy godmothers' raise $92,000 to benefit women

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group of Manhattan women are trying to address the needs of their fellow women. They call themselves the Fairy Godmothers.

Polly Stoecklein, a certified financial planner, advised clients for years about the importance of keeping money in Manhattan. She said while the Manhattan donor list contains worthy causes, there was nothing about women in need in the Manhattan community.

"We just thought there needed to be a fund that was primarily designed by women and supported by women," said S. Lee Taylor, a founding member of the Fairy Godmothers. "Women don't always get to be benefactors. We hope the fund will be there when they most need it and when they are most vulnerable."

Stoecklein's thinking led to planning. To reach out to women in the community, she said she wanted to gather many women with smaller amounts of money to acquire $10,000 for a donor-advised fund with a broader definition.

Along with help from the Manhattan Community Foundation, the Fairy Godmothers Fund was created.

"The foundation itself is not a cause – it is a conduit to a cause," Stoecklein said.

Within the community foundation, a donor can have what is called a donor-advised fund. This is a fund that requires a contribution of $10,000 and the donor decides where the

Stoecklein said she realized this was a lot of money for women to contribute so she wanted to make it easier. She said each member of the Fairy Godmothers Fund pledged or gave $500 during a two-year period.

"What we are doing today we might not see all the fruits of it, but younger women are going to follow behind us," Stoecklein said. "We created something that will not have an ending."

The Fairy Godmothers Fund has raised more than $92,000. "A group of women had really put some blind trust in this founding five," Stoecklein said. "We got our starting committees, and we are going to evolve our rules with these group of women."

Sue Maes, a founding Fairy Godmother and immediate past president of the Manhattan Community Foundation, said the Fairy Godmothers stand firm that the money will go to the provider of service rather than the individual in

"We hope they in turn will give back to another individual in need," said Maes, senior development officer at K-State. "In the spirit of the Fairy Godmothers, they in turn will help others."

Lucy Williams, another founding Fairy Godmother, said the spirit is just women helping other women.

"We have tapped a nerve in the community," Williams

"This is for women who can't use the normal social service avenues, and we are a safety net for them to turn to."

Event to honor disabled students

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first Disability Awareness Week will celebrate the nearly 600 K-State students with disabilities while informing other students about the lives of disabled people.

"We're just hoping to educate the communities of K-State and Manhattan in the area of disabilities and encourage others to see them as productive members of the community," said Andrea Blair, director of Disability Support Services.

The week will include a film, panel discussions, booths, presentations and other interactive learning activities. The week's festivities will begin with a showing of the film "Murderball" at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre.

On Wednesday, K-State volleyball coach Suzie Fritz will experience firsthand what it is like to be a physically-disabled student.

She will spend an hour in a wheelchair, performing tasks common to K-State students in wheelchairs.

"I hope she will be able to share with the others the positive and negative aspects of people in wheelchairs, as well as find out how friendly and accessible the K-State campus is," Blair said.

From noon to 1 p.m. on Wednesday, students with disabilities will discuss the experience of having a disability, K-State hand signers will interpret songs using American Sign Language, and students can create teddy bears for children with disabilities.

"We're looking to celebrate with everyone," Blair said Ward Foley, author of "Thank My Lucky Scars," will present a lecture on overcoming the adversity of being disabled from noon to 1 p.m. Priday.

On Saturday, DSS will sponsor a wheelchair basket-ball game featuring the Kansas Wheelhawks and KC Thunder teams, Division II members of the National Wheelchair Basketball Association. After the game, attendees will learn how to play wheelchair basketball from members of the team. Participants in the clinic then will play abbreviated games.

"I hope people will learn resources that are in our community at K-State, in Manhattan and in Kansas," she said. "We might be able to make some attitude changes in regard to people with disabilities."

Hit | Women's basketball

After their questionable inclusion in the WNIT, the 4-State women have made the most of their opportunity. unday's 67-54 victory makes them the last remaining Big 12 team in any tournament. It would have been nice to see a run in the NCAA tournament, but we'll take what we can get.

Hit | Spring weather

Returning to class after a week off is always rough especially when you see people grilling and enjoying weather while you head back to campus to work on a newspaper. Still, it's great to roll out the shorts and sandals and gear up for the last two months of the semester.

Hit Voluntarily smoke-free bar

Aggleville's newest bar, The KatHouse Lounge provides an option for anyone who wants to spend a night at the bars without smelling like an ashtray. If a couple more bars voluntarily banned smoking, everyone would be pleased, and Manhattan residents could quit wasting time debating a controversial smoking ban.

Miss | Pet food sabotage

Menu Foods recently issued a recall of wet pet food items after discovering that some of the products Menu Foods manufactured were tainted with rat poison. Several dogs and cats fell ill or died of kidney failure across North America. Whether the poisoning was deliberate or was a legitimate mistake, it's troubling when the safety of food even food for our pets — becomes compromised.

Miss | Unconfirmed Dane Cook rumors

Rumors have been flying around campus for the last few months about a performance by Dane Cook at K-State. Unfortunately, they are still nothing but rurnors. The Union Program Council officially has sent a proposal, but there is still no word on the response. You'll know the answer as

Miss | Computer-generated turtles

With the release of "TMNT" and the upcoming "Transformers" and "Speed Racer" movies, it would seem that Hollywood is capitalizing on early '90s nostalgia. However, we want the old Ninja Turtles back. Just because they have fancy computers these days doesn't mean they can't make another live-action movie. At least it's not as bad as the animated 1987 flick "Masters of the Universe."

Legislative garbage

Bush administration conceals truth about U.S. attorney general scandal

In Washington, D.C. (and an occasional episode of "The West Wing"), Fridays are known as "take out the trash day."

The theory says news doesn't stay "new" for more than a day or two, and if that time-span elapses during the weekend, there won't be as much of an audience watching the nightly news. So, if you release politically bad news on a Friday afternoon, the populace won't pay as much attention to it as otherwise.

Last Friday, the White House dropped a pile of documents related to the ongoing U.S. attorney firing scandal. These just add to the evidence contesting the official story for those firings and bring Attorney General Gonzales one step closer to being out the door.

The trouble started last December when eight U.S. attorneys (out of 93 total) unexpectedly resigned (read: politely were fired) from their positions. These resignations piqued the interest of Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein of California and Patrick Leahy of Vermont, who wrote to Gonzales in January asking for an explanation.

In early February, Paul McNulty, deputy attorney general, testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee that the firings were all "performance related." Several of the former U.S. attorneys contested this, pointing to positive evaluations and approval to use Gonzales as a reference for future job searches.

GREG BROWN

On March 1, McClatchy Newspapers reported that one of the fired U.S. attorneys, David Iglesias, resisted pressure by two Republican members of Congress from New Mexico to investigate local Democrats for corruption.

It quickly came out that most of the other U.S. attorneys were looked upon unfavorably for political reasons. A week or so later, these suspicions were confirmed by the first release of e-mails from Justice Department servers.

While Gonzales denied involvement, the second mails released last Friday afternoon show otherwise, revealing a onehour meeting in which he personally signed off on the plan.

With all this evidence, we're left with two possibilities: Gonzales and other senior officials are lying, or the attorney general has a poor memory and little involvement in Justice Department affairs. Either charge is enough to warrant dismissal in my book, but Bush and Gonzales appear to think otherwise, with statements of support as recently as Saturday.

In the meantime, Congress is pressing onward, threatening to subpoena several officials if they don't willingly testify under oath. The Bush Administration has refused, only offering private interviews.

Leahy staunchly has rejected the White House's offers, even refusing fellow committee member Sen. Arlen Specter's compromise of transcripts without a formal oath or televised proceedings.

Under any current offer.

> Leahy has put his subpoena threats on hold for a week while he and allies negotiate with White House officials. During that ceasefire, Gonzales' former chief of staff Kyle Sampson will testify to Congress at 9 a.m. Thursday.

I'd watch.

DEFEATING RADICAL ISLAM

THE BOSTON GLOBE

Intimidating critics through trumped-up claims of "discrimination" is something of the house specialty at the Council on American-Islamic Relations. CAIR is involved in the lawsuit filed against US Airways by six imams who were kicked off a flight after their behavior alarmed other passengers. CAIR cranked out a press release noting that the imams had filed a lawsuit alleging that their civil rights were violated.

CAIR and the imams also are targeting those who reported the behavior, which reportedly included praying ostentatiously near the gate, refusing to take assigned seats after boarding, and asking for unnecessary seat-belt extenders that could be used as weapons.

Some Islamist groups have gotten much mileage out of such strong-arm tactics. There is good news: some Americans are pushing back. And even better news: Some of the push-back is coming from Muslims who forcefully reject the Islamist project.

NOT FUN AND GAMES

THE TIMES OF INDIA

I find superstitions hilarious. All my life I've been playful with superstitions by deliberately walking under ladders, picking fun fights with those who played with keys, and spitting 7 times outside my car window if a black cat crossed my path.

I have a penchant for travel, so I deliberately put my shoes one over the other, and every time my evil eye bracelet, strung together by an ultra thin plastic string, breaks after a frenzied week of use, I grin and dramatically pronounce that it has deflected evil cast in my direction.

But superstition isn't fun and games for many. People base their lives and careers and risk name and love for it.

They marry only in months and on particular dates that are auspicious, won't marry those whose horoscopes don't match, don't even buy a pencil in the month of shraad, and believe deeply in gemology, Vaastu and numerology.

CHRISTIAN POLITICS

THE WICHITA EAGLE

Twenty-five evangelical leaders exposed a rift among conservative Christians when they sent a letter to the board of the National Association of Evangelicals. The leaders criticized the NAE's vice president, Rev. Richard Cizik, for his views on global warming.

They contended that Cizik's "relentless campaign" proclaiming the dangers of global warming isn't representative of the 30 million people under the NAE's umbrella. His outspoken views, they said, are shifting attention from the "great moral issues of our time, notably the sanctity of human life, the integrity of marriage and the teaching of sexual abstinence and morality to our children." Evangelicals are better off being autonomous from the Republican party. The Bible addresses a broad range of issues, and so should Christians, whether liberal or conservative. They also should show charity toward those with whom they disagree.

Act leaves something behind

There are a lot of bills and acts proposed in the U.S. government every year. and many affect all Americans. One of these is the No Child Left Behind Act that was signed into law in early 2002 and is due to expire this year.

This act requires all schools receiving government funding to mandate annual standardized testing. Those schools that consistently fail to meet minimum test scores risklosing their funding and accreditation. This act also requires that all schools release the names, phone numbers and addresses of their students to military...

There are many aspects of this controversial law. PBS.org reported that the $400 million allocated for aspects of testing in the NCLB Act solely will benefitthe manufacturers of the standardized tests. These companies enter into contracts with state government to supply the tests, thus creating a monopoly of sorts in the testing market.

Additionally, many school boards do not receive enough government funding to cover their own costs for meeting the guidelines of the act. If President Bush believed that the act really would work for students, he should have given schools the funding needed to implement the regulations of NCLB.

Although it is a great idea to make sure students are keeping up with others their age, standardized testing isn'tthe way to go. Some students (myselfincluded) do not show their true intelligence on tests because they are fighting anxiety and stress that these pressurized tests create. Different learning styles in students make it impossible for everyone to succeed at the tests, even though they may have the same intelligence level.

Additionally, because there is so much emphasis on the testing, it seems like many schools focus in the areas that are tested (specifically, reading and math) and withdrawing funds from the liberal art programs, like art, photography and music. Additionally, bright students who would benefit from higher-level academic programs suffer because they are forced to learn a curriculum meeting the bare intelligence level of the student body as a whole - allowing a few struggling students to drag down everyone.

According to an article entitled "The looming fight over No Child Left-Behind" by David Broder in the Washington Post, more and more Republicans are refusing to back the plan's renewal. Many people believe that the choice of whether to participate in the standardized testing should be up to each individual state.

This act does not improve the education of America's students because it refuses to see the individual circumstances of each student, including childhood and previous education. Instead, it solely focuses on test scores to provide all the available information and statistics. This does not fairly represent the diversity of the United States and instead attempts to force everyone into a level of almost inaccessible success.

Lack of pre-event reporting cuts awareness

Editor,

I just want to write a quick note concerning the method of reporting in the Collegian.

Every day when I read the paper, I am disappointed. Essentially this disappointment stems from the lack of event reporting ahead of time.

I see articles on events, programs and speakers I would have loved to attend, but I had no idea they were even planned because the Collegian only reports on events after the fact.

I feel the Collegian should print a daily calendar listing the events for the next couple of days ahead of time, so everyone can have the opportunity to attend. This would be very helpful, especially to people like me who aren't on campus all the time.

Sarah E. Velasquez GRADUATE STUDENT IN AGRICULTURE BUSINESS

'Earbud Evil' not an example of good fiction

I understand, I really do. I can imagine a multitude of situations that could lead to the publication of the story that you have been running in the Collegian recently, I really

But none of them can justify the result.

If you go through all the trouble of serializing a story in your paper, please go find something that in some way at least resembles a legitimate attempt at good fiction writing.

If I read another sentence of this "story," my brain potentially could explode. And that will be on your heads.

But I understand this happens sometimes. Someone says, "Hey, I've got this friend with this funny story." And you say "Hmm, well, they seem really nice, so I'll do it." Sometimes you must be cruel to be kind, Collegian people.

So, in the future when considering putting fiction in your paper, swing by English 461 or 661, or just give someone in the English department a call. They can find something for you. And I promise, even "Intro to Fiction" can produce plenty of stories that won't make me wish for other people to spontaneously become illiterate to save them from reading the "story" I mentioned earlier.

I understand - I do. But stop the terror.

Stop it now. Thank you, and God bless

Beyond expectation

Wildcats prove they belong

While K-State's collegians celebrated their freedom from the shackles of higher learning, the K-State Collegian did some research on the Women's National Invitation Tournament. Here's what we discovered.

The WNIT, like the University of Phoenix or the Jelly of the Month Club, lacks rigorous admissions standards overall record and a pulse.

When K-State finished its regular season with a 16-14 record, it seemed the Wildcats had satisfied only half of the equation. With 12 losses in their final 14 games, the Wildcats looked like they'd gone the way of Anna Nicole Smith.

That led many, myself included, to wonder if K-State belonged in any kind of postseason tournament. Now, three games in, one thing has become clear

We were wrong.

The Wildcats made a convincing case for themselves by dismantling the Missouri Valley Conference's regularseason champion (Southern Illinois) and outmuscling the Big Ten Conference's fourth-place finisher (Illinois).

The clincher came Sunday, when the Wildcats dominated Auburn in a game that didn't feel as close as the 67-54 final score. Watching K-State smack around a 20-win team from the Southeastern Conference made it clear the Wildcats' WNIT bid was no fluke.

"Some people said, 'Do you deserve to be here?' and I said, 'Absolutely," said coach Deb Patterson on Sunday, adding, "I don't think we limped in. I don't think we were a gift to be in. I think we deserved to be in, and we've demonstrated that."

It's not immediately clear, however, why K-State looked like such a lousy team for the better part of two months. It seems there were several factors that conspired against the

First and foremost, there was the injury to sophomore Marlies Gipson. It's tough to explain just how important Gipson was to this team. She led the Wildcats in rebounding and huddle and folded everyone's laundry after the game. The girl could do it all. It's tough to replace a player with

Late-season run pumps up Patterson

By Jonathan Garten

Three weeks ago, it appeared as if the K-State women's basketball season was finished.

The Wildcats lost in the first round of the Big 12 Conference Tournament and finished dead last in the conference after losing 10 of their last 11 games. Last place Big 12 teams usually are not rewarded with postseason play.

Despite the Wildcats' late-season collapse, the Women's National Invitation Tournament extended a bid to K-State

Since the Wildcats were one of the few Big 12 teams to finish the season with an overall winning record, they earned an invitation over several teams that finished with better conference records.

Similar to last season when K-State won the WNIT Championship, the Wildcats (21-14, 4-12 Big 12) are making another postseason run. Sunday they defeated Auburn (20-13, 6-8 Southeastern Conference) 67-54 at Bramlage Coliseum for their third WNIT win this sea-

"I'm off the wall quite frankly when I see our players competing like that every possession," said coach Deb Patterson. "It doesn't matter if every possession goes your way. It's just how excited you feel about your team playing this

It would have been hard to find a Wildcat more enthusiastic than Patterson.

She spent most of the game pacing up and down the sideline while clapping and constantly giving instructions to the players on the bench.

One particular play, a secondhalf block by junior Shana Wheeler on Auburn's 6-foot-7 center KeKe Carrier, left Patterson in a jubilant state. Patterson celebrated the swat by lifting one leg and throwing an uppercut into the air.

When asked what she was thinking after Wheeler's rejection, Patterson let out a loud "Oooh."

"That was just huge," Patterson said. "Shana has just been extraordinary on the defensive end. She's not giving up on plays. I can't say enough about how our post players defended tonight. These are great SEC post players. I mean Carrier and (DeWanna) Bonner - it just doesn't get much better than that."

K-State held the Auburn post players to eight points in the first half. That defense carried the Wildcats to a 37-18 lead at halftime.

However, Auburn cut K-State's lead to 11 after going on an 18-2 run in the second half. Carrier used her size to score all 11 of her points during that stretch.

"That's going to happen," Patterson said. "It's very unrealistic to think you're going to run away from anybody at this point in the season. You know they're going to make runs. You know they're a great team."

Freshman Ashley Sweat led all scorers with 21 points, and junior Kimberly Dietz finished with 19. Sophomore Shalee Lehning nearly recorded a triple-double with nine points, nine rebounds and eight as-

Huggins, men's basketball team see many ups and downs

By Jeffrey Rake KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In just his first season as K-State men's basketball coach, Bob Huggins pumped new life into a program and fan base that previously had been gasping for air.

With record-breaking attendance and national TV appearances, the Wildcats weren't short on exposure.

Here's a look back at some of the year's most memorable moments, first the good and then the bad.

THE GOOD

Three's key triumph at Texas

Not to be outdone by the K-State football team, which beat then No. 4 Texas, last season, the basketball team accomplished the same feat on the hardwood.

The Wildcats went into Austin, Texas and made 14-of-27 3-point attempts, helping them to a 73-72 win that snapped the then-No. 22 Longhorns' 22-game home winning streak.

Fans black out Bramlage Coliseum

A sold-out, blacked-out crowd arrived at Bramlage Coliseum, hoping to see K-State finally end its home losing streak against rival Kansas. It wasn't to be, as the Jayhawks won 71-62.

However, they weren't the only winners. K-State PROUD, the first alluniversity student campaign of its kind, raised $62,572 for its Changing Lives Campaign by selling black T-shirts.

Senior sendoff

Prior to playing the final game of the regular season against Oklahoma, K-State's five seniors were honored in a brief ceremony on Senior Day at Bramlage.

One senior, Serge Afeli, seemingly stole the show as he expressed his appreciation and gratitude to his fans.

When his name was announced, Afeli and Huggins embraced at midcourt and hugged for more than 10 seconds. Afeli's eyes welled up.

A native of the Ivory Coast, Afeli will graduate with honors.

Fitchburg, Mass.

After much speculation about where he would end up, prep school standout Michael Beasley finally decided to commit to K-State. Beasley, rated as the No. 1 recruit by Rivals.com, is currently at Notre Dame Prep School in Though many figure him to stay one year before jumping to the NBA, Beasley maintains that he plans on staying all four years and earning his degree.

THE BAD

Poor first impression

To say the Wildcats stumbled out of the gate would be an understatement, especially after they needed three overtimes to defeat lowly Division II opponent Washburn 94-90 at home in their season opener.

Sure, it was only an exhibition game, but K-State came away from that game realizing it was a long way away from becoming the team it wanted to be.

Colon packs a punch

As if K-State losing to California 78-48 on Nov. 29 wasn't bad enough, freshman Luis Colon found a way to turn it into a nightmarish night.

With less than seven minutes remaining, Colon delivered a left-handed blow to the backside of Cal's Taylor Harrison, who had apparently gotten under his skin.

Colon was ejected from the game, and received an automatic one-game suspension for his actions. The next day, Huggins called the incident an "embarrassing situation."

Welcome to Bennettville

During his post-game radio show following K-State's home game against Baylor Jan. 17, a frustrated Huggins had some critical comments for students not using their tickets.

They want to come in and do this 'Huggieville' thing, then fill it," he said. "I don't want my name associated with something that's half right."

What he said after that never has been properly explained.

"Let's name it something else. Let's name it Bennettville (after 7-foot-3 freshman Jason Bennett) or something else if we're not going to fill the thing."

K-State not on the guest list

In the face of history, the NCAA Tournament selection committee denied the Wildcats a spot in the "Big Dance." The Wildcats, along with Syracuse, became the first major conference teams since 1999 to not receive a bid after winning 20 overall games and 10 in conference.

Instead, K-State competed in the National Invitation Tournament, advancing to the second round before losing to DePaul.

BBC | K-State baseball rallies for 11-9 win over Longhorns

Catcher Rob Vaughn collected a career-high four hits, including a grand slam, and K-State had 17 hits as the Wildcats rallied for an 11-9 win over No. 9 Texas Sunday at Disch-Falk Field to salvage the final game of the three-game

K-State improved to 18-6 overall and 1-2 in Big 12 Conference play, while Texas moved to 22-8 overall and 5-1 in Big 12 play.

Down 9-8 in the eighth K-State rallied for three runs as pinch hitter Tyler Ruch drew a walk and moved to second on a Tyler Link sacrifice bunt. Then: Eddie Vasquez reached or an infield single and Ruch came around to score the tying run when second baseman Travis Tucker's throw went wild of first.

After Vaughn's fourth hit of the game, Bunker struck out but the play developed into the goahead run. As Bunker struck out on a ball in the dirt, Vasquez was caught between second and third, but Texas' Preston Clark's throw to second went into centerfield, allowing Vasquez to score the 10th run of the game. Biery then drove in Vaughn with a single to left, giving the Wildcats an 11-9 lead.

Daniel Edwards came in and worked the final two innings, giving up just one hit while striking out three, including a perfect ninth inning as the junior earned his Big 12-leading seventh save of the season. K-State's late offense output made a winner of Justin Murray (2-2) as the sophomore went 3.0 innings, giving up two runs on three hits with one

The three runs in the eighth came off Texas closer Randy Boone (0-5) as the senior surrendered five runs on five hits over 1 1/3 innings of work.

Texas took a 1-0 lead in the first as two hits and a Bradley Suttle sacrifice fly scored the game's first run and the Longhorns added another run in the second on a two-out single from Nick Peoples.

The Wildcats answered with one run in the third as Vasquez walked and moved to third on a Vaughn double off the wall in left. Bunker drove in Vasquez on a grounder to first, which Chance Wheeless misplayed, allowing Bunker to reach base. But Jordan Cruz hit into an inningending double play to keep the score at 2-1. Texas got the run back in the bottom half of the third as Suttle's two-out solo homer down the line in left upped the lead back to two at 3-1.

K-State then broke through offensively for five runs in the fifth inning to take a 6-3 lead. Adam Muenster, J.J. Muse and Vasquez all opened the inning with singles and Vaughn followed with a grand slam down the line in left for his first career homer. Biery added a solo homer, his first of the season, as the Wildcats chased starter Joseph Krebs in the inning. But Texas came back with six runs in the bottom half of the fifth as two hit batters, two walks and a bases-loaded triple from Preston Clark led the Horns in the frame Biery's sacrifice fly and Bloxom's two-out single plated two more runs for the Wildcats as they got back to within one run at 9-8.

Vaughn paced the 17-hit attack for K-State with four hits and four RBI, while Bloxom had three hits, and Biery, Muse and Vasquez each had two hits.

JOPLIN LIVES ON

Play depicts life of '60s rock star through letters

"Love, Janis" ****

Play review by Alex Peak

"Some people live, some survive. I'm a survivor. I plan to be around for a long time," said the character portraying Janis Joplin during the play/biographical concert "Love, Janis" on Saturday afternoon at the Kansas City Repertory Theatre in Kansas City, Mo.

The musical is an interpretation of Joplin's life through letters she wrote to her family and interviews from newspapers, radio and television.

Overall, the play is exceptional. It features two women representing Joplin. One woman plays the "Speaking Janis" while the other is the "Singing Janis." There are also many scenes where both actors recite lines simultaneously or in conversation form with each other, depicting Joplin's untamed yet bright mannerisms.

"Speaking Janis," played by Lena Kaminsky, narrates the play and tells the story of Joplin's experiences from 1966 to 1970 in San Francisco and on tour across the United States. Most of her dialogue is in the form of letters she has written to her family and includes many anecdotes that give the audience a taste of Joplin's humor and intelligence. She describes Joplin's various pets, consumption of drugs, and alcohol and her love of literature.

"Singing Janis," performed by either Kacee Clanton or Mary Bridget Davies depending on the show, sings short renditions of about 11 of Joplin's hits in concert style with a full band on stage. During Saturday's show, Clanton belted out Joplin's tunes with integrity.

The play's arrangement allows the audience to see two sides to Joplin: her outrageous, bluesy, rock-'n'roll performances and her humble, soft tone in letters to family.

The two actors complement each other and the many facets of Joplin's personality by visualizing a real cause-and-effect biography of her life. The audience is able to understand and sympathize with Joplin from her beginning, lonely days in California through her fame with different bands all the way to her eventual death.

Along with its unusual layout, the play has excellent costumes, instrumental music, vocals and props.

The actors are able to capture the essence of Joplin, down to her rose-colored glasses, raspy voice, polyester attire, bangles, beaded necklaces and feathered boas.

Watching the play gives viewers a retrospective feel like watching an old movie clip from the '60s.

Contrary to Joplin's quote, "I'm a survivor," which was in response toa a request for comment about the death of Jimi Hendrix after he died of drug overdose, Joplin died Oct. 4, 1970, of a heroin overdose.

She was found dead at the Landmark Motor Hotel in Los Angeles only weeks after Hendrix died, also

With the drug and alcohol lifestyle Joplin enjoyed, she was not around for a long time. However, her spirit, style and music have survived. This is made evident by the production of the play, which was inspired by the book "Love, Janis." Laura Joplin, Janis' sister, wrote the book with a compilation of letters

Vivica A. Fox charged with misdemeanor DUI

LOS ANGELES - Vivica A. Fox was charged Friday with misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of alcohol and driving with a blood-alcohol level above the legal limit, officials said. If convicted, the 42year-old actress faces a maximum six months in jail and/or a $1,000 fine, city attorney spokesman Frank Mateljan said.

Fox was arrested late Tuesday after passing a patrol car on the Hol-lywood Freeway at 80 mph and subsequently failing a field sobriety test, authorities said. Breathalyzer tests indicated her blood-alcohol level was greater than .08 percent, the legal limit for a driver.

Fox was released from jail early Wednesday. Lita Richardson, a woman who answered the phone at the office of Fox's manager, said, "We have no comment," then hung up.

Fox, a contestant on last year's "Dancing with the Stars," has appeared in such films as "Kill Bill: Vol. 1,""Soul Food" and "Independence

Her arraignment was set for May 17, Mateljan said.

The anticipated disclosure comes more than six weeks after she was found unresponsive at her hotel suite in Hollywood, Fla.

The autopsy results had been expected weeks ago but repeatedly have been delayed, in part because the Broward County medical examiner, Dr. Joshua Perper, said he received additional evidence from the Seminole Police Department.

'Shooter' aims to please audiences

Wahlberg talks about latest movie, previous roles

By Eileen Laux KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mark Wahlberg, star of the new action film, "Shooter," recently participated in a teleconference. to discuss the film and his career. The film opened Friday with Wahlberg as Bob Lee Swagger, a former marine scout sniper, who is lured back into action but then is framed in an attempted presidential assassination.

Q: You have been in a lot of movies where you played these really iconic roles. So what's your favorite character you've played so

A: I would have to say it's between this character, Dirk Diggler, and Sgt. Dignam from "The Departed."

Q: What was the biggest challenge in filming this new movie? A: The physical and mental demands of the movie. You know, I knew going in it was going to be tough, but actually making the movie, the stuff was pretty rigor-

Q: In one scene, your character says, "Let's see what lies they're feeding us now," referring to the news. Can you tell me your opinion on that? Do you agree with that?

A: Definitely. I think there's a lot of misinformation being fed. But, you know, obviously the character that I play is extremely suspicious about everything that's going on in the world.

But yeah, there's a lot of information being fed out there and you got to kind of sift through it all and really look closely to see what's real and what's not obvi-

Q: What was it like working with Antoine Fuqua, and have you ever thought about directing? A: I definitely want to direct in the future. Antoine is somebody that I enjoyed working with so much that we're talking about doing our next project together. But I feel like, you know, I really want to study all of the filmmakers that I work with and gain as much knowledge as possible before I take the plunge and get behind the camera.

Q: What are the things that you think about when you read a script, and how do you choose your roles?

A: Basically now we choose by which films we want to go and see in the theater - which roles we think people would want to see

You know, for a good portion of my career, it was all about the filmmaker, and we necessarily didn't focus on the part or the script itself. And you know, I think we're at the stage of our career where we got to start satisfying the audience and ourselves. So basically, yeah. I want to make movies that I would want to go and see and that I think people want to see me in.

Q: I was wondering what makes "Shooter" different from other high-intensity action movies?

A: Well, the high-intensity action movies that they've been making lately aren't really the kind of character-driven movies that I love and that I grew up watching in the '70s.

This is kind of a throw-back to that. You know, you've got a guy's guy who's all about honor and integrity, and you know, it reminded me of the great films that I grew up watching. It's much more of a Travis Bickle or a, you know, Dirty Harry, than it is, you know, a Terminator-type character.

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Before seeing it myself, I assumed the writers of "Shooter" used some sort of "Mad Libs" form letter to conceive the plot.

A group of mysterious government officials convince an ex-soldier to come out of retirement for one last job. Something goes wrong. He vows to seek revenge. He spits out cheesy lines like "They started it, but I intend to finish it." Things blow up. He kills everyone he shoots at, but their bullets fail to connect.

It's the basic formula for an action movie, and you've probably seen it before. It tears through the action movie cliché checklist from the very beginning. It would have been easy for the movie's star, Mark Wahlberg, to write this off as another paycheck, and the rest of us could have rented "Rambo" and avoided an evening of over-priced snacks and long lines at the movie theater.

Despite all the reasons to banish "Shooter" to the Wal-Mart's bargain bin and move on, all the pieces fall together to form a solid film.

Wahlberg, fresh from his first Oscar nomination for "The Departed," plays the role of sniper Bob Lee Swagger with enough restraint to keep things believable. Swagger would do anything for his country.

When he realizes his superiors consider him expendable, his faith in patriotism shatters, but he never loses touch with the things that make his character sympathetic.

He's played the revenge role before, and convincingly so. His work in "Four Brothers" and "The Italian Job" already has given him a shot at a character seeking revenge, but this time he faces more than a detached nemesis - he faces an intricate government conspiracy and the resources of an entire nation's law enforcement agencies.

The rest of the cast gives solid performances proving that interesting characters can save an otherwise average movie from mediocrity.

The plot twists and turns regularly and predictably. Things blow up, lots of bullets are fired and nothing gets in the way of a possible sequel. Sure, it's a formulaic action movie, but it has just enough energy to pull away from the rest of the crowd.

Incumbent city commissioners up for re-election

Mayor with 12 years of experience relates to students, seeks better childcare

By Allison Voris KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the constant growth of Fort Riley and renovations in Manhattan, one candidate for Manhattan City Commission said his experience in the city government could be useful.

Bruce Snead, mayor of Manhattan and commissioner for 12 years, will run for reelection.

Morris-Hardeman tries to remain close to citizens, improve rental property condition

Morris-Hardeman she is the best candidate for the job because she has worked hard the past two years to improve the city and stay close to the people.

"I've tried to respond to every e-mail I've received and phone call or letter to make sure the people's voice is being heard," she said.

Morris-Hardeman went on to say she also has worked to understand the issues with which the city government must deal.

While her platform is very similar to the one she had for her last campaign, she has made one addition.

The newest part of her platform is the protection of public health.

This includes banning smoking in restaurants and making sure area rental properties are up to code and safe for their occupants.

"My husband and I own the house next to us as a rental property, and we make sure that it is code compliant," Hardeman said.

TRAVEL | Collegian staff travels for spring break

the people I met during a latenight beach bonfire.

On a Monday night with hot dogs, boxed wine, a case of Pat's Blue Ribbon beer, wood, and s'more ingredients, we proceeded to the beach.

Once the bonfire was aflame and the hotdogs were roasting, the atmosphere was pleasant.

At first, there were seven of us relaxing on blankets and enjoying the surroundings, but within an hour or so, our peaceful group seemed to triple.

One random unknown guy showed up with a case of beer and a guitar. He claimed to be a singer and player of Beatles' songs. "Claimed" was the operative word.

Another oddball couple showed up, about the age of my parents, literally professing they were French and could speak French. Fourteen years of French classes was enough for me to know they were lying.

The couples' eyes were glowing red, and they made for rather slurred and dazed conversa-

Shortly after making acquaintances with these people, my friend and I made our way back to the bus stop and eventually home.

After bumbling like a string of licorice in the wind trying to keep my balance on all of the trains, planes and automobiles and ferries, I realized the trip to San Francisco was entirely more educational than I had expected.

— Alex Peak

WASHINGTON, D.C. AND VIRGINIA

I feel like I'm home when I see the Lincoln Monument and the U.S. Capitol in Washington, D.C.

After my parents moved East at the start of my sophomore year at K-State, I never thought I would become accustomed to the fast-paced lifestyle in the nation's capital. But, this Kansas girl eventually had a change of heart.

Every time I fly to D.C. to visit, my heart grows happy with the realization of being with my parents soon. After a few trips East, I began to associate the nation's birthplace with my own site of comfort.

So, when my friend, Corey Mayes, mentioned a road trip to Virginia for spring break, I jumped at the chance. Corev. senior in elementary education and wildlife biology, said she wanted to visit her parents in Chesapeake, Va., about three hours away from my house. Corey and I convinced her fiancé Josh Yarrow, senior in civil engineering, his sister Melissa; sophomore at Sterling College in Sterling, Kan., and friends, Gina Koester, senior in architectural engineering, and Bridget McGuire, senior in microbiology, to join our road trip

Bridget said the road trip was great for "spending time with my really great friends for one last fling before graduation."

After 20 hours of driving cross-country, my friends and I spent a few days hopping around some of the nation's most famous memorials and monuments. Our friend Gina had never been to D.C. before the trip and had only seen the monuments in photographs.

"They're a lot bigger than I expected, and you could touch them," she said. "The Washington (Monument) – the stone in it glittered. It was beautiful stone"

Three days into the trip, I hugged my parents tightly goodbye and jumped into the car to join my friends on the drive down Virginia's coast. Corey's parents took our group on a scenic drive through the nearby Naval Base and Army Post, built near the ocean.

"I just love being around wa-

FIELD

ter - no matter where you go," Corey said. "It's such a different landscape than Kansas."

We spent a day on the beach, soaking up sun and diving into icy, cold water in the Atlantic Ocean, before we realized our trip was coming to an end.

Driving back is bittersweet. Classes, lectures, homework and finals loam in the not-toodistant future.

But I look at my souvenirs

– a week of activities, sightseeing and memories – and heave a contented sigh. A successful spring break – a road trip with friends and a visit home.

Now, I just have to figure out how to survive the rest of the semester.

— Lacey D. Mackey

DALLAS AND SOUTH PADRE ISLAND

Doing nothing of significance never felt so good.

Although it meant just less than 40 hours on the road, spring break also meant a time to relax and not worry about any school-related activities.

It meant swimming in the waves of the Gulf of Mexico, relaxing on the beach, visiting places uncommon to Kansas but most importantly, seeing an old roommate and sharing good times with a K-State friends.

Our trip to Dallas was long but better than being in class. We spent a day relaxing there, visiting some eateries not seen in Kansas like Whataburger and watching some college basketball.

Another nine- to ten-hour drive left us at South Padre Island. We welcomed the sea breeze and soft sand of the beach. The beach atmosphere was not busy or obnoxious; it was soothing. As was the seafood and company of fellow visitors of the beach.

The weather was almost perfect the whole time at the beach. There was not a cloud in the sky, which meant the sun was out in full force, ready to tan and burn. Regretfully, most of us failed to apply suntan lotion. This was not the best idea for my friends and me. The restless nights and massive peeling may have been the worst part of the break. My friend even burned a light tint of purple – needless to say, it was not pretty.

All these places were enjoyable, but maybe the best experience was going to a pool hall in the Dallas and sharing some laughs and lousy pool-playing skills with close friends.

The trip was a break from the everyday Kansas week. The scenery, the people and the places were completely different from those of Manhattan and Kansas. Other than a few friends, the trip offered something I greatly needed, a break from the ordinary.

— Scott Girard

TOPEKA AND HUTCHINSON

Call me an underachiever.

My brother Drew went to Germany for spring break. My sister Caitlin went to New York and Washington.

I didn't even leave the state.

With graduation and real-world employment – hopefully – less than two months away, I decided it would be best to spend some time with my two youngest brothers while I still had the chance.

We took two mini-trips last week; one to the Combat Air Museum in Topeka and the Cosmosphere in Hutchinson, Kan. All told, we spent about $100.

The C.A.M. was plenty of fun, and a lot more laid-back than most museums. Some planes are entirely roped-off, but visitors are allowed to walk up and touch much of their aircraft. They're even allowed inside of the Sikorsky NCH-53A Sea Stallion helicopter and Lockheed EC-121-T Super Constellation airplane.

The volunteers were fun as well. One showed us the wiring job he'd done to put lights inside the cockpit of a Sikorsky CH-54A Tarhe (Sky Crane) by climbing up on top of the machine and pointing it out. It was pretty impressive, as the guy couldn't have been younger than 50.

The Cosmosphere was also a good deal. It has an extensive collection of items from the U.S. and Soviet Union space programs. For example, it has the Apollo 13 command module, famous for exploding and almost killing three astronauts in 1970, and the Liberty Bell 7 Mercury capsule, famous for sinking to the bottom of the ocean and almost killing astronaut Gus Grissom in 1961.

My brothers said they liked "Dr. Goddard's Lab," a live science show named for the father of modern rocketry, Robert Goddard. The show was supposed to teach them about the science of rocketry, but what they really liked were all the the explosions.

3 K-State students involved in downtown Denver shooting

By Megan Moser KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Police confirmed a K-State student was wounded during a shooting in a Denver parking lot Sunday. Two other K-State students were involved, but were not injured, police said.

John Watt, sophomore in philosophy, was one of three people shot Sunday when two men robbed them at a parking lot near a light rail station, according to detective Virginia Quinones of the Denver Police Department.

Though the victims complied with their assailants, each was shot – one in the face, one in the neck and one in the back, she said. Watt is listed in fair condition at Denver Health Medical Center.

Ian Dumpert, Paola, Kan., and Joseph Kubel, Glen Ellyn, Ill., also were wounded. Dumpert is listed in serious condition and Kubel is listed in fair condition.

"There were seven people total involved in the shooting," Quinones said. "Unfortunately, we do not have any suspects at this time."

Of the four who were not injured, two are K-State students. Dakota Hensley, sophomore in chemical engineering, and Kenneth Geifer, freshman in chemical engineering, were present during the incident but were not injured, according to reports from Colorado's 9 News. Calls to the students were not returned.

The shooting occurred after the group left a concert early Sunday morning at Cervantes' Masterpiece Ballroom at 25th and Welton streets.

Philip Zevenbergen, junior in regional and community planning, who is from Denver, said he has been to that area before.

"It's in downtown Denver, sort of the northern part of downtown," he said. "It's home to a lot of clubs and bars and coffee shops – the whole nightlife scene. In my mind, it's not a place I would just randomly walk around at 5 in the morning. It's a prime location for crime to happen. There are a lot of people walking around with a good amount of money going to the clubs."

Daniel Nelson, Manhattan resident, attended Wamego High School with Watt. He said Watt, who enjoys skating, is involved in K-State's Men's Glee Club.

"He's really into music and he's into spending time with his friends," Nelson said. "His friends mean the world to him."

Burst pipe damages sorority house

By Christina Hansen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sprinkler system pipe burst Sunday afternoon at the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority house, causing an estimated $30,000 in structural and content damage.

Anessa Burgess, junior in early childhood education and resident of the Kappa house, 517 Fairchild Terrace, witnessed the pipe burst in her room around 5:30 p.m. as she unpacked her bags after returning from a spring break trip.

"I heard a little buzzing noise while I was putting some clothes in my closet," Burgess said. "I looked up, but it wasn't the fire alarm. All of the sudden, black water started gushing out of a pipe in the ceiling of my closet. I screamed and started trying to move things out of the room."

Several housemates heard Burgess's scream and came running to see what had happened. They called the Manhattan Fire Department, and firefighters arrived about 10 minutes later to turn off the water.

Assistant fire chief Rick Berry said firefighters on the scene used portable water vacuums to soak up standing water after the broken pipe was sealed

Berry said structural damage at the house was estimated at $20,000, with an additional $10,000 in damages to the house's contents. The cause of the initial pipe burst was still unclear, he Residents moved all possessions and furniture out of the flooded rooms and cleaned as much as possible before a professional cleaning service arrived to treat the carpet around 8 p.m. Industrial fans were then placed in each room to begin drying the carpet.

Burgess said personal and house insurance policies would cover the replacement cost of some damaged possessions, but insurance could not replace several sentimental items that also were destroyed.

"There were computers, a DVD player, printers, and iPods in the room, but even worse, we lost personal items like my grandmother's yarn," she said. "She gave it to me before she died, and I was using it to make a blanket for my dad. There are things like my yarn or pictures that you can't really replace."

Andrea Weber, president of the K-State chapter of Kappa Kappa Gamma and senior in music education, declined to comment on Sunday's pipe burst until an official statement was released from the sorority's national headquarters.

UFM course offers students chance to practice age-old fighting skills

By Brie Handgraaf
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Duels might have been commonplace back in the Dark Ages, but they aren't exactly everyday occurrences in the Information Age.

However, students in a UFM Community Learning Center course took a nostalgic step back to learn the sport of fencing.

"There isn't anywhere else in town where you can legally take a piece of metal and hit another human being," said Jeff Gwirtz, a fencing teacher and associate professor in grain science and industry. "If you did this anywhere else but a fencing class, you'd go to jail."

Fencing might be a rising sport, but it still is relatively misunderstood.

"It's not the slashing and thrashing fights you see in the movies," said Monica Olsen, student in the beginner's class and sophomore in open option. "It's very precise and quick. A simple little twitch of the thumb can make or break you."

But there is more to fencing than just learning the moves.

"I think the mental aspect to fencing is what made me want to take it, but I didn't expect it to be as physically demanding," said Brad Lutz, student in the beginner's class and senior in electrical engineering.

Fencing comes in three forms, each with their own swords, rules and methods for scoring.

The method most people learn first is foil fencing. In foil, fencers can only score on their opponent by hitting the torso with the point of the sword.

In the second type of fencing, épée, fencers score by hitting anywhere on their opponent's body.

Sabre fencing is the third and final form practiced today. Instead of jabbing with the tip of the sword, fencers score points using a slashing motion with the blade.

The target also is different – anything above the waist is fair game.

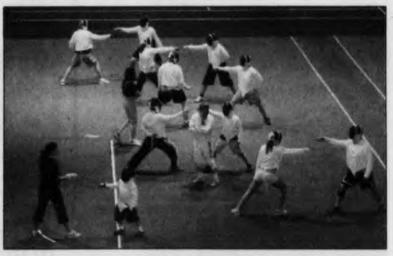

"Sabre and épée are almost intuitive, because it is like what you think fighting somebody would be like," Gwirtz said. "You could just pick it up and start, but most people start with the foil to learn some of the footwork and control."

Even though the class lasts less than 20 hours altogether, Gwirtz said he hopes to teach people the basics of each style.

"In terms of the fencing world, we are definitely the country bumpkins here," he said.

"We are here for a good time, and if we accidentally score a point, great, and if we win, that is even better."

Credit card security not an issue in Manhattan, official says

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Restaurants across the nation are upgrading to tighter-security credit card systems in hopes of eliminating credit card fraud and identity theft. However, the Little Apple seems to have swiped past the controversy.

"You hear one or two stories on the radio every once in a while," said John Pagen, director of economic development for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce. "But I don't think (credit card fraud) is a widespread problem here."

Still, Pagen said he thinks it is smart for restaurants to take proactive steps toward tighter security.

"(Fraud) is an issue anytime you give your credit card to someone," he said. To help lower fraud and identity theft rates, many restaurants have implemented new systems like ultrasecure credit and pay-at-the-table devices.

Ultra-secure credit directly sends card information to the holder's bank in an encrypted form so no important data is left in the computer.

Pay-at-the-table devices are handheld and brought directly to the customer's table. The card never leaves the holder's sight, eliminating the threat of skimmers – devices that lift information from the magnetic strip on the credit card.

According to the March 5 edition of USA Today, Ruby Tuesday announced it is the first national restaurant to offer the ultra-secure

City Commission to vote on eminent domain issue

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The City Commission will vote on the first reading of an eminent domain ordinance tonight at city hall.

The ordinance would authorize the city to invoke eminent domain to acquire properties within the south end redevelopment area.

All of the property owners within the south end redevelopment project area are required to relocate in order for the project to proceed. Dial Realty has been negotiating with all of the owners. They all were offered at least 25 percent more than the appraisal value for the sale of their properties, as well as compensation and help for relocation, according to city

The commission voted in a special meeting two weeks ago that condemnation proceedings were necessary and instructed the director of public works to conduct a survey of the properties for which agreements had not yet been made.

Eminent domain comes from the last provision of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, which reads: "... nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled using it to take land for economic development is not unconstitutional.

The city had planned to take longer before making these decisions, but a law passed by the Kansas Legislature last year forced its hand.

The law ends the city's ability to use eminent domain to buy property for economic development purposes July 1.

"I don't feel good about it, that's for sure," said Mayor Bruce Snead. He added "I believe it's in the best long-term interest of downtown."

Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, said property owners still can negotiate if they choose to sell at any time during the condemnation proceedings.

The condemnation process has been described by city staff as long and complex. It involves bringing in outside appraisers to value the property, and a court decision to

"Is it fair if my business fails because I cannot afford the property payments or lease?" Bruce Michal, owner of Manhattan Pawn Shop, said at the meeting.

If the commission approves the ordinance, the final reading would be April 3, according to city staff.

The commission also will discuss the expansion of Manhattan Regional Airport in a joint work session meeting with the Airport Advisory Board.

Currently, Air Midwest provides three daily roundtrip flights from Manhattan to Kansas City, Mo. The city and the airport hope to expand, although Air Midwest has only one plane in Manhattan.

"Our goal is to expand commercial air service into Manhattan," Snead said.

The contract between MRA and Air Midwest will expire in February 2008, at which point MRA could make a contract with a larger commercial airline company, according to city staff.

Of the 23 properties within the area, these eight have not yet sold, according to city staff.

Campus remains active spring break

By Hannah Blick KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If a tree falls in the woods and no one is around to hear it, does it make a sound? Similar to this age-old curiosity, many students might not know what happens on campus when they leave for spring break. While campus might be the furthest place from vacationing minds, maintenance crews as well as some students remain during the break, continuing with their work and studies.

One group of people that dedicated its spring break efforts to the campus was the maintenance crew of the Division of Facilities. More than 100 employees worked all week to play "catch-up" on repairs around campus.

A special project this past spring break included updates to Hale Library, said John Woods, director of facilities services. Repairs were made to both main entrances to the library, as well as the stairway within the building. Maintenance employees also shampooed the carpets and fixed damage to the red tile floors, Woods said. Facilities also did spring cleaning in other areas of the campus like classrooms and professors' offices.

"Spring break gives us the opportunity to take care of repairs in the classrooms and other places we might not normally be able to get to do when students are around," said Ed Heptig, director of facilities maintenance.

Grounds crews also installed and tested irrigation systems during the break, another project made easier by students' absence, Woods said. Some minor landscaping also was completed.

While many students leave town after their last Friday classes, a few stick around during spring break, for various reasons.

Jared Lund, freshman in general engineering, spent his break in Manhattan, working. Lund, who lives in Moore Hall, stayed with a relative and worked at Panera Bread.

The traffic around town seemed pretty much the same," Lund said. "But I could definitely tell it was break because Panera wasn't very busy all week."

Many international students do not have the option of traveling home for the break. Moore Hall and Jardine Apartments remain open for their Gunjan Gakhar, graduate student in diagnostic medicine/cathoviology, stayed in town during the break because it was too expensive for her to fly home to India for only one week. Gakhar made a weekend trip to Iowa to visit family, but spent the rest of the week working on research in the lab.

"I did relax, and I loved sleeping in," Gakhar said. "I watched some 'Grey's Anatomy' and read a novel, so that kept me busy. I also played tennis at the rec and just hung out with some of my friends."

She said the weather in Manhattan was beautiful all week, and campus was quiet and peaceful without the usual hustle and bustle of students.

What goes around

Edwards' current needs contrary to prior legal vendettas against doctors

Presidential hopeful John Edwards acquired his wealth by targeting doctors in frivolous malpractice lawsuits. But it seems actions of the past have come full circle. John Edwards and his wife, Elizabeth, announced the breast cancer for which she was treated during the 2004 election has returned and metastasized to her

The odds of her survival are slim, and I do not celebrate this news. However, I find it ironic the Edwards family needs the industry John worked hard to undermine throughout his career as a trial attorney and through his new universal health care plan.

Prior to his term as a senator, John Edwards made millions driving doctors into bankruptcy.

In one of his greatest acting roles, Edwards convinced a jury in 1997 that a stillborn child by the name of Bailey Griffin was speaking through him.

He explained to the jury the little girl told him how much pain she was in and how the doctor should have performed a Cesarean section sooner to prevent her death.

Complications from cerebral palsy caused this child's death. The American Academy of Pediatrics says cerebral palsy develops long before the birth of the child and is rarely the responsibility of a doctor. The Griffin case resulted in a $23 million settlement.

Increased costs in the medical field have a direct correlation to the increased cost in medical malpractice insurance. In Edwards' home state, rural doctors are forced to close their practices due to insurance costs.

Dr. Craig VanDerVeer, a Charlotte, N.C., neurosurgeon, told the Washington Times, "The John Edwards we know crushed obstetrics gynecology and neurosurgery in North Carolina. As a result, thousands of patients lost their health care."

Medical costs are increasing and creating problems for lowerincome families, but the solution is not a universal health care pro-

The solution is creating an environment where medical care has competition between doctors. Caps on payments for malpractice lawsuits and regulating insurance rates for malpractice insurance are two methods of creating better competition.

Government interference, like the universal plan Edwards put forth, will only make the situation worse for the medical field.

Under the Edwards plan, the government will pick up the tab for any private business unable to afford insurance for its employees.

Money doesn't just appear in the hands of the government. It arrives to the government in the form of taxes, and Edwards said he has no problem increasing income taxes to pay for his program.

When Elizabeth Edwards dies, she will be used as a martyr for her husband's universal health care

The Republican Party will not have the guts to stand up against a bill named after a senator's dead

Since liberals in America believe Canada's medical program is the best example for the United States, we should treat her under the same treatment is free, but it doesn't do much good when treatment is time sensitive.

Many national newspapers have been running stories about the rapid care Elizabeth Edwards has received since her cancer returned.

With the current condition of his wife, John Edwards needs to reevaluate his past career and his plans for the future when it comes to his attacks against the medical field. He should not slap the hand that treats his family.

Added security measures at restaurants a good move

In life, there are few situations in which people are called to hand over their credit card to a perfect stranger and blindly trust that they will use it responsibly. One exception, however, is when dining out.

Every day, be it for a $100 lobster dinner or a Big Mac at the McDonald's drive-thru, an increasing number of people are using their credit or debit cards to pay for meals. Students in particular often do not carry a lot of cash, as it is much more efficient to hand over their cards.

However, along with that increased efficiency, there also lies the potential for increasingly lax security.

Many students - in fact, many people in general - are not as informed about their day-to-day financial transactions as they should be, and it is all too easy for an unscrupulous person to take advantage of that fact. Whether it be an angry server who adds an extra dollar to his tip or a down-and-out criminal who records card numbers for an online shopping spree, credit card fraud is every-

As technology continues to advance, though, it seems completely nonsensical for customers to have any reason to fear when paying for their meals. Though in general, we trust the employees of the many restaurants in town - and around the country - that we visit, there remains the possibility that the occasional shiftylooking character who eagerly takes our credit cards and sneakily creeps away could be, in fact, up to no good.

The steps many restaurants and franchises around the country are beginning to take to ensuring ultimate financial protection for their customers truly are encouraging and should be applauded. We can only hope that many more follow suit, as such steps certainly would increase our willingness to frequent their establishments.

Approval nice, not always necessary

I am an obsessive peoplepleaser.

In every aspect of my life,

whether it is as a student, daughter, friend or aspiring journalist, I have this dependency on " others' approval. When I gain approval in any form, it's like a high. Adrenaline rushes through my body, and it's as though I have begun some quest to save the world. It is an amazing feeling until it wears off.

Then I am back to work, pushing to gain the approval of someone else in my life.

Approval and dependence on others, however, is not just an annoying personality trait. According to a March 6 report in The New York Times, one's helpless need to be cared for is a problem. psychiatrists have diagnosed as dependent personality disorder. Researchers are finding that dependency and the seeking of approval can have an effect on personal relationships.

Psychologists also are applying neediness and dependency to college students. During a recent study, psychologists rated men and women on measures of dependency at Gettysburg College (Penn.) and calculated their grade point averages.

Upon examination of SAT scores and the difficulty of course schedules, among other factors, the psychologists found studentswho scored highly on measures of dependency also did significantly better at academics than those who were self-sufficient.

I am, by no means, qualified i offer psychiatric or psychological advice. However, I have lived 21 wise years, and I know a thing or three after living as one who seeks approval.

Gaining the approval of others is nice, and it certainly is not. harmful in and of itself. We set . goals for ourselves, we work hard for those goals, and in turn, we all deserve recognition when those goals are achieved. However, the world will not cease to exist if we "fail" in one aspect of life. It is only human nature to make mistakes and not meet every expectation society has outlined for us.

Sometimes college becomes a race or an obstacle course; we work to have several honor society memberships, good grades and a five-page list of references. Without depreciating the value of higher education, the biggest lessons I have learned at K-State have not resulted from the classroom or library. Rather, I have learned more through conversations with my peers, colleagues ; and professors.

I have a close friend who did not make it into a senior honorary as an undergraduate at K-State. She applied to more than 10 Ph.D. psychology programs. She was accepted into several prestigious programs. Her story is only one example of how a setback did not prevent her from achieving her goal.

We cannot change the way others view us; their actions andthoughts are theirs alone. The only thing you can change is how you view yourself.

Try something radical - try gaining your own approval for a change.

N. IRELAND ANNOUNCES POWER-SHARING DEAL AFTER HISTORIC MEETING

BELFAST, Northern Ireland - The leaders of Northern Ireland's major Protestant and Catholic parties, sitting side by side for the first time in history, announced a stunning deal Monday to forge a coalition of archenemies within six weeks.

"We all saw something today that people never, ever thought would happen," said British Secretary of State Peter Hain, who expects to hand power on May 8 to a coalition led by the polar opposites of provincial politics: Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionists and Gerry Adams' Sinn Fein.

On May 8 the Northern Ireland Assembly would elect a 12-member administration with Paisley at its head.

EGYPT'S REFERENDUM TO AMEND CONSTITUTION RECEIVES LOW TURNOUT

CAIRO, Egypt - Turnout was low Monday in a rushed referendum on amending Egypt's constitution, changes the government has touted as democratic reforms but critics dismiss as attempts to curtail rights and consolidate the regime's power.

The amendments would abolish emergency laws, allow election supervision by an independent commission and ban political parties based on religion in this key U.S. ally.

On the eve of the vote, President Hosni Mubarak said such changes would "give a new push to political party activity" and would "stop the exploitation of religion and illegal political behavior."

BILL TO REINSTATE MANY SADDAM FOLLOWERS GOING TO PARLIAMENT

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Iraq's president will introduce legislation as early as Tuesday to let former members of Saddam Hussein's ruling party resume jobs in the government, Iraqi officials said Monday.

Long demanded by the U.S. to appease Iraq's once-dominant Sunni Arab minority, the measure would set a threemonth challenge period after which ex-Baath party loyalists would be immune from legal punishment for their actions during Saddam's reign.

The reconciliation measure is seen as an effort to short-circuit expected criticism of Iraq's government at an Arab League summit this week.

Organization, planning help wedding plans run smoothly

By Lacey D. Mackey KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Planning a wedding can be difficult, but planning a wedding while going to school or working full-time could cause a permanent migraine.

Marissa Moeder, owner of Celebrations of the Heart, said she sees several college-aged students come to her store, trying to plan their weddings while still in

To help these students balance time, Moeder said she explains up-front shipping dates and when to order the bridal gown and tuxedos. She said the store tries to be as flexible as possible with stu-

Moeder said she has seen some students come through her doors who seem overly

In one instance, Moeder said she had a veterinary student from K-State come in, and because of the bride-tobe's intense study load, she seemed more frazzled with school and wedding plans than other brides.

Her advice: "Don't procrastinate."

With both schoolwork and a wedding, Moeder said students need to steer clear of the desire to put things off until later. To help, she said students can practice time management and plan times to work on wedding preparations during weeks with less schoolwork or fewer tests.

Laura Henning, senior in accounting, got engaged during winter break and said she dove right into planning her August wedding. Surprisingly, Henning said, the wedding details have been going well. With help from her mother and fiancé, Henning said a bulk of the work was completed during winter and spring breaks.

"Now, I'm surprised at how easy it's gone," she said.

Henning said the couple quickly, because they had a short time to make plans. Some people had told Henning's mother the couple would not have enough time to plan for their big day, but Henning said everything is falling into place.

Emily Neumann, who graduated from K-State in December 2006, is planning a September wedding while working as a resource teacher for USD 383 and a barista at Radina's Coffeehouse and Days are full at school, and Neumann said she spends her Saturday nights at work, making it difficult to find time to drive to the Kansas City area, where she is doing her wedding planning.

"It's hard to get away to get something done," she said.

To accomplish tasks, Neumann said she and her fiancé constantly make lists. Work is Neumann's priority, but she said she takes time during her lunch hour to make calls about wedding details.

Neumann said her advice for engaged couples planning 1 a wedding is to be realistic about time

For brides- and groomsto-be in the planning stage, Henning said try not to get stressed.

"Don't get caught up in the little things," she said. "It's going to go by so fast."

Signing Evans a risky move

Now that basketball season has finally come to an end, allow me to fill you in on something.

Bob Huggins owns you

He's owned you since Jan. 17 when he criticized fans for not filling the seats at Bramlage Coliseum following K-State's 69-60 win over Baylor. When Huggins arrived in Manhattan last March, he promised to build a winning team at K-State. After fans scooped up just about every seat prior to the season, it was assumed they would make sure Huggins played to a near-capacity arena every night. It's only fair, right?

Only that didn't happen at first. For some reason, fans didn't find Cleveland State, Tennessee Tech and Maryland Eastern Shore to be compelling non-conference matchups. Once Big 12 Conference play began, fans didn't seem too pumped about Baylor, either.

And so, Huggins started playing hard-to-get and began complaining about the empty seats. The belief was if fans didn't fill the seats, Huggins would go to a school where they would. After all, if he's going to make K-State basketball a winner again, it's the least fans can do.

Soon enough, fans responded - and if you remember, his criticisms came during his post-game radio show, where he made the "Bennettville" comment. It was at that point Huggins won over the fans, and they pledged their undying support.

That support helped carry K-State to 23 wins, a fourth-place Big 12 finish and a spot in the postseason for the first time since 1999. Now, Huggins wants that support to spill over into the offseason, as signing day looms ahead. In other words, he wants you to look the other way.

The news hit earlier this month that Tyree Evans, a talented, yet allegedly troubled young man from Virginia, had made a verbal commitment to K-State. When Huggins was coach at Cincinnati, Evans planned to join the team in 2004 but was denied because of grades.

Upon arriving at K-State, Huggins immediately wanted to bring Evans to Manhattan, but Evans' questionable background, which included a statutory rape charge, slowed the process. Prior to the case being decided, Director of Intercollegiate Athletics Tim Weiser said the Wildcats were no longer interested in pursuing Evans.

"In my opinion, the fit was not going to be a good one," Weiser told The Kansas City Star in its July 14, 2006. edition. "I shared that with Coach (Huggins), and he agreed."

However, Evans reached a plea agreement soon after and pleaded guilty on a lesser charge of assault and battery. He is now on two years' probation. With the case resolved, Weiser backtracked on his comments, indicating he would re-evaluate Evans'

In the meantime, Evans decided to enroll at Butler County Community College but was dismissed by coach Randy Smithson in early January for "conduct detrimental to the team's cohesiveness."

And K-State's still interested? Oh, I sure hope not - too risky.

Having seen these types of situations before, I understand K-State fans probably will be on two different sides of the fence. One side will marvel at Evans' jump shot and scoring ability, the other side will scream about morals and use words like "integrity."

None of that's important, though. That's because no matter how you feel, Huggins is counting on you - his trusty fans and supporters - to clam up and lay low until Evans is in a Wildcat uniform. You need to keep quiet while Huggins uses his best sales pitch to talk Weiser into signing off on his latest project.

Out to shock again

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior Eddie Vasquez runs the bases during the Wildcats' 6-3 win over North Dakota State March 11. K-State will take on No. 10 Wichita State today after knocking off No. 9 Texas 11-9 Sunday.

Wildcats look to upset another ranked opponent

By Dayne Logan KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On the heels of an 11-9 victory against No. 9 Texas, the K-State baseball team (18-6) will face another ranked opponent in the form of No. 10 Wichita State (21-5) tonight at 7 at Tointon Family Stadium.

The Wildcats and Shockers split last season's series with each team winning the home leg, but this season's clash appears to be even more difficult for the Wildcats.

For starters, the Wichita State pitching staff is one of the best in the nation. The Shockers' overall ERA is a mere 2.28, and tonight's projected starter, sophomore Anthony Capra, boasts an impressive 0.46 ERA in his 19 2/3 innings of work this sea-

"It's going to be a great matchup," coach Brad Hill said. "Their pitching staff is just outstanding, and obviously, they have a very experienced lineup, so it's going to be a difficult challenge for us."

Even more troubling for the Wildcats might be the depth of the Shockers' batting order.

"They have a number of kids with five or six home runs, and that makes it difficult," Hill said. "With Texas, you had four guys who could really hurt you, where Wichita State may have seven or eight."

That power could spell trouble for a Wildcat pitching staff that lately has struggled to find the strike

K-State pitchers surrendered a total of 19 walks in last weekend's 3-game set with Texas. Junior Brad Hutt, who only has walked 12 batters all season, allowed four walks on Friday.

"Brad Hutt had four walks on Friday," Hill said. "I think he's had four all year. We just can't walk people." Despite the tough losses K-State suffered Friday and Saturday, Hill said Sunday's victory was just what the team needed to get its confidence back.

"Our kids did an excellent job of putting those two games in the past. It would have been really easy for our kids to just lay it down right there, but they didn't," Hill said.

The Wildcats impressed their coach by overcoming a six-run Longhorn rally in the bottom of the fifth inning with a pair of multiple-run innings of their own in the seventh and eighth. Particularly impressive was sophomore catcher Rob Vaughn, who went 4-for-4 Sunday with four RBI and three runs

"He's just a kid that keeps working and keeps working," Hill said. "You may not see immediate results, but (Sunday) some of his hard work came to fruition."

Seven matches later, the Wildcats still are trying to find a way to win after dropping all three of their

"We've had to make some adjustments with the changes that have gone on," coach Steve Bietau said. "We've lost people for different reasons, and we've had to start over and readjust our goals, and that's been part of our losing streak."

K-State (2-9, 0-2 Big 12 Conference) faced defending conference champion Baylor on March 18 and

Baylor (10-6, 4-1 Big 12) has three top singles players in No. 38 Zuzana Zemenova, No. 52 Zuzana Cerna and No. 67 Lenka Broosova, all three of whom helped Baylor

The only victory for the Wildcats came at the No. 2 doubles spot, when junior Olga Klimova and sophomore Katerina Kudlackova defeated Broosova and Klara Zrustova (6-7) after Baylor was disqualified.

"It was a code violation," Bietau said of the disqualification. "It was a behavioral issue, and the decision to disqualify them was made by their coach. It's unfortunate when something like that happens, because it took away our opportunity to win the match outright."

The Wildcats then traveled to Fort Worth, Texas, on March 19 to face No. 37 Texas Christian University (9-7, 0-0 Mountain West Conference), which defeated K-State, 6-1.

K-State's only victories came by default because TCU had only five players. Freshman Natasha Vieira was granted the win at No. 6 singles, and the pair of Vieira and junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia won at No. 3 doubles.

Thursday's matches at Fresno State didn't yield a positive result for the Wildcats as they were swept 7-0 by the No. 13 Bulldogs.

The sole victory of the day came at No. 3 singles when Kvaratskhelia and Vieira defeated Danon Beatty and Vanessa Heroux, 9-7, in doubles play. Fresno State, which has three ranked players on its roster, swept the singles matches.

"I thought the overall effort was pretty good," Bietau said. "There were places that could have been better, and at the same time, it's hard to sit here and say how happy I've been going 0-3 last week. I think the players are continuing to work and I'm not seeing any give up in anybody. They're in competitive athletics, and they wouldn't be there if they weren't concerned about winning or losing.

The Wildcats will face Oklahoma on Saturday in Norman, Okla., and Oklahoma State on Sunday in Stillwater, Okla.

FBN | Police to seek charges against 'Pacman' Jones

LAS VEGAS — Tennessee Titans star Adam "Pacman" Jones could face felony and misdemeanor charges stemming from a triple shooting at a strip club meanor threat and battery charges in the 5 a.m. shooting at Minxx, police Lt.

George Castro said Castro said detectives haven't determined who fired the shots that wounded three people, one critically, outside the club during the NBA All-Star game

Castro said the request for charges will be submitted to Clark County district attorney David Roger no later than the end of the week. Roger will be asked to consider charges against the 23-year-old Jones and Robert Reid, 37, and Sadia Morrison, 24, whom Castro described as friends of Jones

No arrest warrants have been issued, and an investigation will continue into whether another person might have been involved and fired the shots.

Castro characterized Jones as an instigator of a scuffle inside the club that led to the shooting outside. Jones' lawyers denied Minxx club co-owner Robert Susnar's account that Jones arrived and left the club with the shooter. After 500 hours of reviewing videotapes and interviewing witnesses from the club, Castro said police were unable to establish a relationship between Jones and the shooter Jones was questioned by Las Vegas police and released

Two club security guards and an unidentified woman were wounded in the shooting. One guard, who was paralyzed from the waist down, was transferred last week to a rehabilitation hospital. The other guard and the woman were not seriously wounded.

Jones' attorney, Worrick Robinson of Nashville, Tenn., had no comment before Monday's police news conference. Another Jones lawyer, Manny Arora in Atlanta, was out of the office and did not immediately respond to a message from The Associated Press.

The pre-dawn shooting followed a scuffle that broke out in the club when dancers on stage were showered with thousands of dollar bills, according to a police search warrant.

Susnar has said the shooting happened after Jones threatened to kill a bouncer, whom the club owner said intervened when Jones allegedly attacked a dancer who grabbed money on the stage.

Police later reported confiscating $81,000 in cash belonging to Jones. The money was recovered from a safe in the hotel room of Houston-based promoter Chris Mitchell, whose "Harlem Knights" dancers were brought in for the weekend at Minxx, a club several blocks west of the Las Vegas Strip.

The Titans are trying to decide whether to keep Jones, the sixth pick overall in 2005. The cornerback did not tell team officials about being arrested twice in Georgia in 2006.

Up close, personal and unplugged

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many of the acts that make up the Manhattan music scene come in the form of quintets, quartets and trios. But the Little Apple also possesses performers who dare to stand in the spotlight alone, playing solo shows in the smaller confines of quiet coffee-houses and dimly lit bookstores, with nothing but a guitar, a barstool and yrics to accompany them on stage.

And although they must bear the entirety of the focus, these individuals who brave the local music stage find a certain comfort in performing tolo.

"There's something very intimate and very personal about playing alone that I have always enjoyed and have always been drawn to," said Margo May, who usually performs as a one-woman, acoustic folk act.

May, a sophomore in family studes and international relations, said he started writing songs and performing when she was 15 years old, but has yet to join a band during her six-year music career.

"I just feel that what you do as a solo songwriter and musician comes more from your own mind," May said. "Everything is more of your own, and that makes your shows more intimate, and brings the audience closer to you."

May also said along with the enjoyment of performing solo, watching other one-person musical acts during her time in Manhattan has helped develop further as a musician.

"Manhattan has really become a good location for solo, acoustic acts," May said. "There is a lot of local talent here in this genre, but we also get a lot of traveling acts as well, especially at the Dusty Bookshelf. Lawrence and Kansas City might get the bigger bands with the big names. But as far as solo acoustic performers go, I feel that Manhattan gets more nationally known artists. And whether it's a local or national act, I always seem to learn something new from all of these shows."

Joey Murphy, the local solo performer known as Aid, was listed by May as one of her influences, and vice versa. Murphy, who came to Manhattan from Lawrence in 2005, said he plans to move to Chicago by the end of the summer. But regardless of his future plans away from Manhattan, he too noted that the artists of Manhattan have influenced his music

"Even though I plan to continue my music career elsewhere, I feel that Manhattan, and especially some of the other solo performers here, have had a positive impact on my music," Murphy said. "No matter where I go I'll always take with me what I have gained here."

But the appreciation for Manhattan's solo performers and solo shows goes beyond just the musicians themselves. Mary Molina, a video production specialist at K-State, attends many of the acoustic and solo shows at local coffeehouses and bookstores. "I love the relaxed feeling of those shows," Molina said. "I have an interest in all local music, but sometimes it's nice just to get a coffee and sit and listen. And I feel that with less equipment and less amplification that you get a better sense of the musicians talents and their song writing."

Tyler Gregory, a local solo acoustic performer, also said he agreed the simplicity of solo performances can enhance the experience of music

"It really shows what music can be," said Gregory, a freshman at Manhattan Area Technical College. "And that's not to put down other styles or other ways of performing. But I think that when you see a musician simplify everything into a solo performance, it can that music to different level."

Overall, artists' albums represent good efforts

Album reviews by Mark Sibilla

Subtle
"For Hero: For Fool"

Part hip-hop, part experimental rock, part electronica, Subtle has created a complex and bizarre, but utterly essential, album. With so many disparate sounds, the album could have spiraled out of control, but lyricist Doseone and his five bandmates expertly hold everything together, creating a narrative full of dread, racial insecurity and middle-class struggles. The music always compliments Doseone's intense lyrical delivery, which ranges from rapping, singing, spoken word and everything in between. It takes a few listens to digest the album, but listeners are rewarded for following Subtle down its warped rabbit hole.

Sunn 0))) & Boris "Altar" ★★★☆

Arranged by label Southern Lord, doom metal band Sunn O))) and Japanese power-trio Boris teamed up to create "Altar," an album of dense, heavy drone-metal that pushes the boundaries of metal music. The album's success lies in the unified vision of both bands. Listen to "Altar" at high volumes or with an excellent set of headphones, because the combination of synthesizers and down tuned guitars creates new and interesting frequencies and pitches. Five of the six tracks create a tangible tension, which is released in "The Sinking Belle" where Jesse Sykes' ethereal voice lets "Altar" reach a new level of beauty.

Fujiya & Miyagi
"Transparent Things"

One would be excused for thinking Fujiya & Miyagi are a Japanese duo simply based on the band's name. However, it actually is a trio from Brighton, England, that creates music inspired by the German krautrock and motorik movements. Echoing the sounds of bands such as Neu!, Can and Kraftwerk, Fujiya & Miyagi manage to emulate its heroes without ripping off their sounds directly. "Transparent Things" collects many of the group's earlier singles into one compilation and is an excellent introduction to this clever and talented

Local commission hopefuls prepare for elections

Candidate to focus campaign on taxes, improving trust in city government

By Austin Apple KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

George E. Savage, candidate for city commission, wants to address several issues if elected, especially taxes.

"The main (issue) is to get the city taxes under control," he said. "Property taxes are becoming a problem for people with fixed incomes or those who are retired."

The second issue is for local government to gain accountability, Savage said.

"We need to start letting people know that we work for them," he said. "People need to know that they have a voice in their city government, because most think they do not."

This is the first time Savage has become involved in politics, local or otherwise.

"I was in the military for 20 years as a full-time National Guardsman," he said, "I have spent the last year studying city government and how it operates."

Savage said there are many issues in Manhattan that could use fresh eyes.

"I want to offer a fresh opinion and get answers," he said.

Savage said he thinks people have lost trust in the local government.

"There are many issues that need public input," Savage said, "Citizens have given up hope, because they feel the city isn't listening."

One reason he wants to get taxes under control is because so many people have complained about them.

"I cannot tell you about the amount of people who have said that their property taxes are going up," Savage said.

The city needs to take a much more aggressive look property taxes, he said, and lower the amount Manhattan residents have to

Candidate says he has experience to take on new role, improve efficiency

By Kristin Hodges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For his campaign, he said there are three issues on which he will focus if elected.

The first is to push the redevelopment downtown project into conclusion so it does not become a risk for citizens or a financial issue, and the second is representing property-tax payers.

He also is focusing on government efficiency - specifically, the merging of services to increase quality and save

Strawn said he decided to run for city commission when a group of supporters approached him after he was not elected to the Kansas House of Representatives last

"They convinced me that it was importantfor me to run for the city commission, because they felt it was going to go out of balance, and they felt a" commission that was out of balance would not be good for issues that are facing the city," he said: "At that point, I felt it was my. duty to do this."

Smaller chains, including Legal Sea Foods and Hooters, are beginning to test the handheld devices.

Last year, several retailers like California Pizza Kitchen and El Pollo Loco were named in identity theft class-action lawsuits for violating federal law requiring retailers to conceal credit card numbers on receipts, according to the article.

Donald Darfler, assistant general manager for The Little Apple Brewing Company, said his restaurant has never had a problem with credit card fraud and, depending on costs, probably will not implement the General manager for the Buffalo Wild Wings in Aggieville, Griffin Kelley, said because BWW is a corporate chain, he would not be surprised if the ultra-secure or hand-held systems were put into action.

"We haven't had any problems," he said, "but it might be something we do somewhere down the line"

Craig Schreiber, general manager for Famous Dave's Barbecue, said his restaurant is in the same situation. Although he said there never have been issues at Famous Dave's and its system is secure, he is sure the company will be looking into it. And with good reason.

some form of identity theft. Congress passed the Identity Theft and Assumption Deterrence Act in 1998, which, according to the Department of Justice Web site, prohibits knowingly transferring or using, without lawful authority, a means of identification of another person with the intent to commit any unlawful activity constituting a violation of federal, state or local law.

The offense yields a maximum of 15 years in prison, a fine and criminal forfeiture of any personal property used to commit the offense.

Cassie Hamilton, junior in political science, speech communication and pre-law, said she has been a victim of theft. After paying with her debit card last semester, Hamilton said a fast-food worker stole her number.

"I checked my account one day and 900-something dollars was missing," she said. "They took my info off my card when I went through a drive-thru and then used it online since no ID is required to shop there."

Hamilton said her bank noticed the transactions after the perpetrator attempted to make a $1,400 purchase.

The purchase was declined and the bank closed her account to investigate the fraud.

"About six weeks later, I got a letter from my bank saying the problem had been resolved and the bank returned my money," she said. "They didn't tell me who did it or what restaurant they worked at, but I don't care as long as they were punished."

Although Hamilton's story echoes a call for tighter security, Elaine Dhuyveetter, marketing manager for the K-State Credit Union, said the credit union has not had many reports of fraud in the past.

"I think sometimes people have inadvertently ordered things online they didn't think they did," she said, "but we've had very little problems so far."

Dhuyveetter said the bank tries to educate and do everything it can to protect its members from fraud. She said they will close an account as quickly as possible if any issues arise.

She said she views the new security systems positively.

"Anything they can do to prevent identity theft is a good thing," she said.

Dhuyveetter warned students to keep a record of all their credit card numbers in a reachable, safe place in case any unfortunate event were to Intersession is a special time at K-Stateparking is easy, and life on campus is extremely pleasant. Intersession is an excellent way to take courses—it allows the student to pursue one course intensively, without interruptions and demands of other coursework or other campus activities. The relaxed atmosphere of the campus is a perfect setting for a highly concentrated course. Classes usually meet for three hours a day, providing time to focus on a subject in depth.

Perhaps the most attractive feature of Intersession is the opportunity for students to concentrate on one course at a time while earning extra credits to accelerate their programs. Both students and faculty find Intersession to be a rewarding experience.

Intersession offers courses of 1 to 3 credits each from a variety of departments and colleges. Tuition and registration procedures are explained in this brochure and on the web at www.dce.ksu.edu/ intersession. Questions about specific course content or requirements should be addressed to individual instructors. If this publication doesn't answer all your questions, please call the Division of Continuing Education at (785) 532-5566 (toll-free 1-800-432-8222).

Registration

Intersession is open to K-State students and to the public. Prior pre-enrollment at K-State is not necessary and registration is a simple one-step process.

Beginning March 26, 2007, students may register for May/August Intersession courses in one of three ways: any time, from anywhere via the web at www.dce.ksu.edu/intersession; in person at the Division of Continuing Education (DCE), 131 College Court, 1615 Anderson Ave., Manhattan between 8 am and 6 pm; OR, by phone at (785) 532-5566 (toll free: 1-800-432-8222) between 8 am and 6 pm. KATS registration is not possible. Students may request a friend to enroll for them to maximize their chances of getting into their first-choice course. Registrations will be accepted through the first day of class; however, early enrollment is strongly encouraged. Classes are small and enrollments are limited.

No classes will be held on May 28, 2007 due to Memorial Day.

Students planning to use courses toward their degree requirements should check with their advisor to ensure that the Intersession courses selected meet their degree requirements. Also, students must clear any financial delinquencies to the University in order to register for Intersession

"Go/No Go" Lists

The decisions about which Intersession courses "GO" will be based upon the number of registrations. The "Go/No Go" lists will be posted on our web sitewww.dce.ksu.edu/intersession the week of April 30, 2007 and July 16, 2007.

Be Prompt!

Because most classes are small, courses fill quickly. Early enrollment is strongly recommended to secure a place in the class and ensure the course will be a "GO." Although registrations are accepted through the first day of class, delays in student registration could result in courses being canceled. If a student wants to take an Intersession course, it is strongly recommended he/she enroll between March 26-April 27, 2007.

Late Enrollments

A $25.00 late fee will be charged for enrollments received after the first class meeting ends. No enrollments will be accepted after two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed.

Tuition

On-campus coursework will be assessed at resident/non-resident tuition rates. Offcampus coursework will be assessed at a rate of $197 per undergraduate hour and $274 per graduate hour with no distinction made concerning the student's resident/ non-resident status. The on-campus fee structure for coursework administered by the Division of Continuing Education is as follows:

Resident Non-resident Undergraduate $475 $164 per credit hour Graduate $227 $546 per credit hour Additional fees may be assessed for courses in the College of Business, Architecture, and Engineering.

Student Fees and Health Fees

Student fees and health fees are collected on a per-day basis at the rate of $1. Fees for on-campus May/August courses are computed by multiplying the number of days of instruction for the course by the $1 student fee/health fee rate. The fees are not assessed for off-campus instruction or audits.

[Note, not all services offered are open between semesters. Please refer to page 16 of the KSU undergraduate catalog for further fee information.]

Billing

An electronic bill (eBill) detailing your tuition charges will be made available to you on the 15th of each month following your enrollment. Your eBill notification will be sent to your K-State e-mail address. All students must have an electronic ID (eID) in order to receive this.e-mail. If you have not yet created your eID, see "eIDs and Passwords" at www.k-state.edu/infotech/ welcome/ for instructions. To access e-mail sent to your K-State e-mail account, click on "E-mail" at the website above and read about 'WebMail'. Students may also log in to the KATS website (http://kats.ksu.edu) with their eID to view/update their account and obtain their eBill statement.

Retakes

Undergraduate students may retake ssion in order to improve their grades. Students must indicate "Retake" on the enrollment form when they register for the courses.

Audit

Students may enroll for audit beginning April 23, 2007 through the first day of class. (See Enrollment Section for details.) Audit fees are calculated at the lowest tuition rate available for a particular course. Thus, if a course is offered for one or two undergraduate or graduate credit hours, the student is assessed the tuition for one undergraduate resident credit hour. No record is made on the academic transcript and no student/health fees are assessed.

Grades

Intersession grades will be averaged into the student's K-State G.P.A. Grades will be available to students on KATS three weeks after the last day of Intersession. The scholastic record of each undergraduate is evaluated twice yearly, at the end of the fall semester and at the end of the spring semester. The student's scholastic status does not change as a result of work taken in Intersession.

Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed.

Status Change

No status changes (i.e., undergraduate to graduate credit) will be accepted after half of the scheduled class meetings have been completed. All requests for status changes must be submitted in writing to the Division of Continuing Education Registration Office.

Incomplete Policy

If an "I" is received during Intersession, and if the student does not make up the "I" before the end of the following regular semester, a grade may be given by the faculty member without further consultation with the student. If, after the end of the semester, the "I" remains on the record, it will be designated as an "F" and will be computed in the student's GPA, weighted at 0 points per credit. The designation of "NR" (no grade reported) will be treated in a like manner.

Canceled Classes

The "GO/NO GO" notice will be posted on our web site-www.dce.ksu.edu/ intersession the week of April 30, 2007 and July 16, 2007. Students may also phone 532-5566 for information. Students who enrolled in a canceled class have the option of registering in another class or obtaining a full refund. To officially drop or add a class, students must do so in person at 131 College Court or in writing.

Withdrawals

1) A student may withdraw from a class by written request prior to the completion of one-third of the scheduled class meetings without a grade being recorded on the student's transcript. 2) If a student withdraws after one-third, but before twothirds of the scheduled class meetings. a grade of W (Withdrawn) will be issued. 3) No withdrawals will be accepted after two-thirds of the scheduled classes have been completed.

Drop/Add Procedure

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court. Students who fail to attend class may receive an "F" unless they formally drop the course.

Refunds

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, Division of Continuing Education, 131 College Court.

A 100% tuition refund will be issued if the request is received prior to the completion of 20% of the course, or if the class is canceled. A 50% tuition refund will be issued if received on or before the completion of 25% of the course. No refunds will be issued after 25% of the course is completed or if the course is being audited. No refunds will be issued for lab or material fees collected at registration after the first day of class, unless the course is canceled.

Library

During Intersession, the Hale Library hours of operation vary.

For current hours of operation check the web at www.lib.ksu.edu or call (785) 532-3014.

Credit Hour Limit

The maximum credit hours allowed for Intersession is four (4) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than the maximum credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. Students wishing to sign up for courses on an A-Pass-Fail basis must do so at the time of registration, or before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed

Textbooks

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for most classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intersession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's. Some extra copies may be available at the K-State Union Bookstore. Classes for which textbooks have been ordered are indicated with the letters TB at the end of the course description in this listing.

Parking

Permits are required 7 am to 5 pm, Monday-Friday. Obtain parking regulations and permits from K-State Parking Services, Edwards Hall. Their office is open 7:30 am-5 pm, Monday-Friday. Permits cost $2 per day, $7 per week or $15 per month (785) 532-7275.

05/14/2007 to 06/01/2007 9:00 a.m.-1:00 p.m. MTWUF

This course focuses on the phenomenon which probably had the largest impact on US History: immigration. Immigrants shapes everyday life in the US, and has a profound impact on American society. At the same time, debates on the impact of immigration and possible policy approaches continue to stir emotions especially in the post-9/11 era, making immigration one of the most contested topics in the contemporary United States. This course uses a sociological approach to investigate the driving forces of immigration. From the perspective of the immigrants, it shows how the emerging global integration increased the volume of international migration, and how did immigrant experiences change over time due to external factors, such as immigration regulations and the public perception of immigration in the US. The goals of this course are: "to overview the push and pull factors of immigration as well as the operation of migrant networks" to understand the policy context of immigration to investigate the societal responses: exclusion. assimilation, integration and diversity in the American society.

The United States Green Building Council (USGBC) is a national nonprofit organization that is quickly growing with representation from throughout the building industry. Its members include architecture firms, engineering firms, builders, manufacturers, service contractors, government entities (federal, state, and local), real estate developers and owners, financial institutions, universities, retail companies, nonprofit associations, utilities, and others. LEED is the USGBC's primary vehicle for promoting sustainable design and construction. The USGBC developed the LEED Green Building Rating System in response to the U.S. market's demand for a definition of green building. The LEED standard was developed by USGBC members through volunteer committees, with the support of funding from the U.S. Department of Energy. While you were away recovering from finals and recharging for a new semester, several Libraries and iTAC employees were busily accomplishing a minor miracle (perhaps a 5.7 on my unpatented miracle scale). In but a few blinks of an eye. K-State Libraries' Microforms Unit completely traded places with K-State's IT Help Desk and Media Development Center. The Microforms unit now occupies Rooms 313 and 314 and provides reference and customer service from the Government Publications Help Desk on the 3rd floor. The IT Help Desk is now in Room 214 and provides its services from what was formerly the Microforms Desk. The Media Development Center now occupies the areas just west of the new IT Help Desk. Lest the arduousness of this move fail to register fully, consider that the Microforms Unit has a few million microfiche, microfilm, microprint, and microcard titles and that collectively the IT Help Desk and Media Development Center have thousands of pounds of high-end electronics with enough wires to circle the campus twice (OK, so I made that one up, but you get the idea).

So now the obvious question: why? Are the staffs in those areas gluttons for pain or dust aficionados? Were they looking for an excuse to overindulge on holiday confections and concoctions? Did someone lose a bet? No – the real reason for the switch was to make life easier and better for you, the students, staff, and faculty of K-State. The spatial merger of the Microforms and Government Publications Units enables them to provide in-person help for both collections during all of Hale Library's service hours (83 hours per week during fall and spring semesters). The IT Help Desk and Media Development Center are now easier to find, closer in proximity to the bulk of computers and printers in the InfoCommons, and more spacious. Take a look, enjoy, and let us know what you think!

Ask Dave!: A Short Cuts Column

Question: David, I'm a little concerned about typing my dissertation on Hale Library's computers, since there is neither floppy nor C drive to save it to (I call it Transition of Glenn Danzig: from the Horror Punk of the Misfits to the Deathrock of Samhain to the Heavy Metal of Danzig). How can I be assured my work will be safe?

Answer: David? Dkay, first of all, no one has called me David since before Glenn Danzig first sang "Last Caress," so that's got to stop. Second, there are two or three options available to you. A: In a pinch, you can always e-mail the file to yourself, as long as it's not too big for your mailbox. B: Everyone has file storage space on K-State's Unix system. It's basically a centrally managed drive that you can store your files on safely, and access later from any computer. It's a bit tricky to access, but the friendly folks at iTAC can definitely help you out there. C: Purchase a flash drive at the Union. These can be plugged in to any InfoCommons computer and typically contain at least 32 megs of memory. (Now, I'm not really sure what a meg is.

Is that short for megabyte? Or for Meg Ryan? Meg Ryan has always struck me as a bit of a spacey gal, but I suppose 32 of her could still store a lot of raw data. Whatever it stands for, they tell me 32 megs is a lot). Hope that helps, you soon to be Doctor of Hardcore. Sorry, I mean DOCTOR OF HARDCORE!!!!!

A K-State student was injured while on his motorcycle when an SUV struck him Monday.

The accident occurred at 8:10 a.m., injuring Kris Pippin, senior in animal science and industry, at the intersection of Laramie and 17th streets.

"I have no memory of the wreck," Pippin said. "Judging by the 12-inch laceration to my back, that makes me think that I was thrown across the hood and that I scraped my back on the windshield wipers."

Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said Pippin suffered a cut to his back and pain in his head, neck and knee.

The front of his bike was destroyed, Pippin said.

Pippin was wearing eye protection and a helmet, Quintanar said, adding that the police report was incomplete.

Victim to have surgery

By Megan Moser KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All the students involved in Sunday's shooting in Denver will be fine, though one victim must undergo surgery, two witnesses said Tuesday.

John Watt, sophomore in philosophy at K-State, Ian Dumpert and Joseph Kubel, both University of Kansas students, all were shot Sunday after two men robbed them at gunpoint.

Four others present were uninred. Dakota Hensley, sophomore in chemical engineering at K-State; Kenneth Giefer, freshman in chemical engineering at K-State; Trenton Foster, and Joseph Kubell, both University of Kansas students; and Jeff McGhee of Ellinwood, Colo., witnessed the shooting after leaving a concert downtown.

In an interview by Todd Shepherd of Newsradio 850 KOA, Denver, given exclusively to the Collegian, Hensley and Foster said Dumpert, who was shot in the head, would have surgery to remove a throat tube and then would Dirty laundry seems to pile up fast, especially when parents are not around.

Using laundromats to remedy this problem might appear overwhelming to a newcomer, but a guide to Manhattan's laundry services can make this necessary task a bit easier.

SORTING THE CLOTHES

While there are many different methods for sorting, like sorting by color or by fabric, there are some guidelines to remember so clothes are not ruined, according to About. com and Laundry-alternative.com.

White items should be separated because throwing a red sock into a mix of whites could reveal a new pink wardrobe.

Also, whites usually need a warm washing temperature to keep them their whitest.

Red and bright-colored clothing tends to bleed its color and fade, so washing it together can be helpful.

Commission votes to invoke eminent domain

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city commission voted unanimously on the first reading of an ordinance to allow the city to use eminent domain to acquire certain properties within the South End Redevelopment Area.

The commissioners agreed that though it was not something they wanted to do, it was necessary for continuing the redevelopment proj-

"As an elected official, this is truly a test we are faced with in terms of our commitment to our vision of recreating the downtown area and trying to be fair to everybody and all parties involved," said commissioner Tom Phillips.

Mayor Bruce Snead said he hopes the city will not need to rely on eminent domain.

"I am optimistic that the number of properties will be secured by successful neutral negotiations, and hopefully we don't need to use eminent domain at all," he said. "That will remain our priority, but if necessary, we have to take these steps at this time frame."

Negotiations are ongoing between Dial Realty and the seven property owners who still have not accepted Dial's offers. During any time of the condemnation process, the property owners still can negotiate, according to city staff.

"Of the seven that are left, there are a lot of meetings going on, probably only one or two that have really been less communicative, but we keep chiseling away, and we keep trying and working pretty hard to get it," said Bob Welstead, president of Dial Realty.

Representatives from O'Reilly Auto Parts said they were not so satisfied with Dial's negotiations. Charlie Downs, who spoke on behalf of O'Reilly told commissioners that two years earlier during the first planning of the redevelopment project, they had given Dial three different sites where they would be willingly relocate.

However, he said Dial would not communicate with them during that time, and all but two of the sites were sold to other buyers. Later, he said Dial did offer them a relocation site, but it was not adequate.

"Through this whole thing, folks, money has not been an issue. All we've asked is to be kept whole," Downs said. "Were not asking for blue skies. We just want to have a quality location that our great team can continue the great sells that we've earned in the Manhattan

There was a heated discussion after the meeting between Welstead and the representatives from O'Reilly Auto parts. Robert Greene, director of real estate and legal services for O'Reilly Auto Parts, told Welstead that Dial did not do anything for them when Dial had the chance.

"We joined in the hunt three years ago," Greene said of the three properties. "If you want to force us out, have at it."

One of the three sites is still available, and negotiations are in the making to secure it for O'Reilly. "The sky is the limit, and if need be, we'll pay the limit," Welstead told them.

During the meeting, commissioners also discussed the progress of the Air Service Development Project for the Manhattan Regional Airport, known as MHK.

MHK's commercial air service is provided by Air Midwest doing business as US Airways Express.

The schedule and aircraft provided by Air Midwest has had a negative impact on the quality of the airport, according to city staff. Air Midwest has only one 19-seat Beech 1900D aircraft, which flies to Kansas City International Airport 18 times per week, according to city staff.

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but you might learn something

4 people you inevitably will meet in college

INTELLECTUAL SUPERHERO

Intellectual superheroes are neither intellectual nor superheroes, but don't tell them that. They easily are identified by their complete inability to allow class to go by without asking at least 654 questions designed to show how "witty" and "clever" they are.

They will attempt to prove the professor wrong in every class with their inane bantering, regardless of the fact the professor has a doctorate in the field.

If it is a science course, intellectual superheroes will attempt to solve every problem using an alternate method, which always is incorrect. They manage to waste 20 minutes of everyone's lives with their insane method of solving the problem. At least people get to laugh at them when the professor proves them wrong.

SILENT CURVE DESTROYER

Silent curve destroyers have nothing better to do than study. While the class average is a respectable 45 percent, silent curve destroyers have approximately a 1351 percent, thereby totally destroying any chance anyone else had of passing the class.

They can be identified because they will be in the library before anyone gets there and stay far after everyone else has left. They almost certainly will wear the same clothing throughout the entire course, and while they might be human, it is more likely they are some kind of magic robot.

AGENDA ASSAILANT

Agenda assailants have (surprise) an agenda to push on evervone else. In a science class, for example, people will get to hear agenda assailers rant about how the scientist who discovered some principle was a racist or misogynist, and therefore the scientist's scholarly work is meaningless.

Even though the rest of the class is just there to learn, agenda assailants will attempt to turn every class into a political debate.

THE SOCIABLE SLACKER

Sociable slackers are those who go out of their way to talk to everyone on the first day. They are personable and seem like normal, social people - at first. They even suggest trading phone numbers just in case others in the class need help.

Fast forward to the second week of class - they are not there. Same goes for all their classes until right before the midterm when they call up that person who gave them their number to study with.

"Hey, man, what's up? How's it going? Oh, yeah, I missed the last class, can I borrow all your notes and photocopy them? Yeah, we should go grab a beer one day," a slacker will say on the phone.

But no one hears from them or sees them again until it's final exam time and they make the call again asking for notes.

And that beer? A complete fabrication.

Dance club offers new moves, friends

By Elise Podhajsky KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With twirls, twists and dips, the K-State Ballroom Dance Club has become a new, popular organization on campus.

Michaela Muck, president of the recently formed club, said students have taken a greater interest in dancing because of TV shows like "Dancing with the Stars" and "So You Think You Can Dance."

"I think everyone has a secret desire to dance," said Muck, junior in public relations, "but they never act upon it until they have an opportunity like this where there's low pressure and they're are not embarrassed to learn."

Membership within the club has more than quadrupled since its start last semester, now providing lessons to about 75 students.

The club meets nearly every Tuesday afternoon in Union Station at the K-State Student Union and is open to students, faculty and community mem-

Attendees learn dance styles like the rhumba, fox trot, waltz, swing and salsa.

Members can bring a stationary partner to meetings if they wish, but Muck said the club encourages rotating partners throughout lessons to meet and get to know more of the members.

"There's definitely a social benefit," she said. "You get to where you're more outgoing because if you don't go up to people and ask them to dance, you're just kind of stuck."

Lindsay Ratliff, a member of the club and junior in family studies and human services. said she made new friends and her boyfriend through the club.

"It's a really cool way to hang out with your friends and have something to do at the same time," she said.

"You're constantly learning something new so it never gets

To keep members on their toes, Muck said the club will bring in guest instructors as often as possible. She said Student Governing Association recently provided the club with money to bring in Louis Bar on April 24.

Bar is the owner of the Kansas City ballroom dance school, Louis and Company, and has won four national ballroom dancing titles, ranking him fourth in the world.

Muck said the club also has regular teachers, including Michael Bennett, instructor for the UFM Community Learning Center in ballroom, swing and salsa dance, and Laura Mendenhall, junior in conservation

Mendenhall is an experienced international dancer and said she first became interested in ballroom dance at an early

"When I was 10 years old, my sister and I saw a ballroom dancing competition on television," she said. "We really liked it so we looked up a studio and started taking lessons."

Mendenhall has won ballroom dance competitions in the Kansas City area and in St. Louis.

"Dancing is just a cool way to express yourself, and it just feels good," she said. "I don't really have any other opportunities to dance, so just being around people that are as passionate about dancing as I am makes (the club) such a fun atmosphere."

Mendenhall said she has taught the club three styles of dance - rhumba, cha-cha and samba - all fast, upbeat, Latininspired dances.

The best thing about the club, Muck said, is learning new styles, finally having it click and understanding how the body is supposed to move, not just getting the steps.

"I love the accomplishment of dance," she said. "There's something about when you learn a dance and perform with someone else - having that connection with them - you feel like you've accomplished something. It's a really happy feeling."

Peters Recreation Complex names new director, considers improvements

By Scott Girard KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After serving more than five months as acting director of Recreational Services at K-State, Steve Martini is now able to remove "acting" from his official title. Martini assumed the responsibilities of director of rec services March 25. He has worked at the rec since 1980, when Peters Recreation Complex initially opened.

Martini said his job will be to make sure students are well accommodated at the rec. He said the staff's job is more of a custodial job to make sure the rec complex is clean and accessible to all users.

"I want to make it more than just a rec center for students," he said. "I want to make it a place everybody feels comfortable."

He said although K-State has one of the best college rec centers in the United States, he understands there are some facilities that need to be fixed.

"We want to be able to provide the best facilities for students, and we know we have places that are too small and overlooked," he said.

He said many facilities are sub par because of deferred maintenance.

Another issue he hopes to address right away is the staff configuration. He said he needs to fill positions to make sure the staff is ready for the next school

This year, a staff of four did much of the Recreational Services work. He said most school rec facilities average 15 staff members.

He said K-State also has one of the oldest rec centers in the Midwest. When it was built in 1980, K-State was one of the first Big 12 schools to construct a center, he said. Since then, most universities have built and expanded rec centers.

K-State also is in the process of planning possible renovations and additions to the rec. Martini said a committee will decide which changes are needed based on student responses.

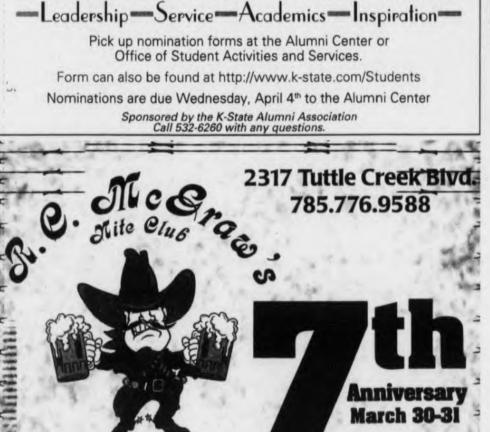

"We are going to take a look at what we have and if we need any renovations," he said. "We need to stay current with all the current fitness trends."

Matt Wagner, student body president-elect and senior in management information systems, said he was pleased with the selection of Martini, and he said he thinks Martini will keep students' thoughts in mind.

"I think he was the best candidate for the job," Wagner said. "He has shown he has strong director skills over the past year as interim director and he successfully managed the budget in line with the students' perspec-

Get to bottom of primary-care issue before it becomes a catastrophe

As a nation grappling with the dilemma of how to deal with the aging baby-boomers, the precipitous decline of primary-care physicians should be sounding off the warning bells of an approaching catastrophe.

Daily we hear of the rising number of uninsured, the bloating of both insurance prices and medical bureaucracy imposed between consumer and producer. This news, combined with the atrophy of America's front-line medical doctors does not paint a rosy picture for the future of medicine in our country.

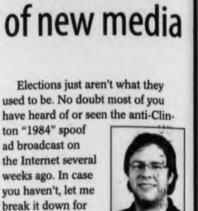

Already, the temporary remedy of "in-sourcing" primary-care providers has taken hold throughout many rural communities. But the peril of relying upon the imported doctors to tend to our health is worrisome to say the least.

Getting to the root of the problems besieging our medical system will not be a simple task.

The current mongrel blend of federal and private insurance providers create a labyrinthian medical system and increased specialization with increased pay lessens incentive for primary care. But the difficulty in finding the solution does not alleviate the necessity.

We must encourage medical reform and not the simple reliance upon others to staff our primary-care positions.

Untangling the nightmarish system of U.S. medicine will not be simple, but that should not deter us from tackling this monumental issue.

The ad features

repeating her catchphrases over and over.

SPENCER

A woman, chased by security, runs into the room, launches a sledge hammer at the screen and it ends by telling us how "On Jan. 14, the Democratic primary will begin, and you will see why 2008 won't be like '1984."

The original commercial, shown during the 1984 Super Bowl, was intended to show the public how IBM, the computer giant of the time, was making everyone mass-produced machines (figuratively and literally) but the new Apple computer was going to break the mold.

So now this new ad surfaces, and apparently, in 2008, Barack Obama is going to break the Democratic mold.

The interesting part about this ad isn't the ad itself. I thought it was rather well done, although I would've used much harsher footage of Hillary than the person responsible did. The real story is the coverage of this ad.

At first, every news organization in the country was in a tizzy over who had made this "controversial" ad. Hillary was sure it was part of the dreaded right-wing conspiracy that still is alive and working against her last name. When it came out that it was some guy who used to work for Obama, it made sense to everyone, considering the ad ended with his Web site.

Now we find out that not only did this man work for Obama, but he lived with Obama's current press secretary while they were working together on another campaign. Needless to say, now the media have no idea how to handle it. I haven't seen them this confused since the Lite Brite scare in February.

Did Obama have this guy make the ad? I don't know, and I don't care.

What has been interesting is watching the dramatic change in politics, along with many other aspects of life, in the 10 short years I've been aware of what's going on in the country. In 1984, the Apple ad was a grand slam for Macintosh. Apple's models took off and IBM has been in the back seat of the personal computer business ever since.

Some also might remember when the first national TV debate tookplace between Richard Nixon and John F. Kennedy. The young, charismatic Kennedy scored major points with the voters, and now cameras follow the president everywhere.

The idea of campaigning online isn't completely new. Hillary herself made her announcement of candidacy on her Web site, and most members of congress have their own sites and blogs.

But now sites like YouTube.com make it possible for anybody in the world to help a campaign. All it takes is some digital movie-making skills and creativity. You and I can now, with the freedom of the Internet, say anything we want about any candidate for any office.

The idea for us to remember, as children of the computer age, is that with the power of the Internet comes responsibility (thank you, Spiderman). It's up to us to use this technology to spread our candidate's ideals but not to slander them. So watch these ads and research what they say. As for me, I'm a PC guy anyway.

Enjoying youth, forgiveness are elements to stress-free, regret-free life

I am a sensible, responsible young woman.

I turn homework in on time, push for improvements in my workplace and write to members of Congress about resolutions on which they vote.

There isn't a single thing that slips through my life without some serious consideration of how it will influence my finances or tight course schedule.

LAWLESS

While my effort to improve our world is noteworthy — and a cross between ambitious and annoying — I'll admit I have a smidgen of dissatisfaction with my stress-for-success lifestyle.

I take things too seriously.

The girl with the stick up her behind – that was me in junior high and high school.

School was my priority, pushing my social life beyond the backburner.

It cost me a lot.

I missed highlights like the ninth-grade dance for alternatives like debate or forensics tournaments - a true nerd at heart.

While I wouldn't give up my decisions to choose academics over the lustier options, I would change one thing – my approach. I wish I would have lightened up and enjoyed those little things that make life worth living.

This past year, I've whittled down my motto to one simple thing: don't take life too seriously.

And for those of you who struggle with the same battle, here are some suggestions to your path of not-so-serious living.

ENJOY YOUR YOUTH

Like any other 20-something here at K-State, you shouldn't be bound to your academic schedule alone. You are young and in college, so start acting like it.

While you don't have to get schnockered and naked like a "Girls Gone Wild" bimbo, you certainly should liven up your schedule.

Take time out of your schedule each week to enjoy your favorite TV show or to hang with your friends.

An occasional night out in Aggieville is also a great resolution to any end-of-the-semester stress. Aside from your diploma, you should ask yourself what grand experiences you shared in college. Once you're out of Manhattan, it'll be hard for you to break into a carefree party mode.

LIVE IN THE MOMENT

For the next 40 years of your life, you can be an adult. Be impulsive and try new things now. Meet new people.

Join a club. Break from your routine and become the new and improved you. You'll probably surprise yourself with where you'll turn out.

For me, I've decided to not worry about life's little consequences, especially with love. I let my heart lead the way and if I get crushed, I plan to pull myself back up again and start over.

FORGIVE OTHERS

With me and my friends, I always make it a rule to not go to bed angry. Wake up refreshed and ready to start your day with a clean slate.

Forgive and forget. When true disaster strikes, ask yourself, "Will this matter tomorrow? In a year? Five years?"

SOMETIMES, ACCEPT DEFEAT

As a former debate queen, I'll admit I like a good win.

I like to argue with my parents and give them a zillion reasons why coming home at 4 a.m. is completely acceptable for a 22year-old woman.

When things are said and done, however, I realize it's not important to win every argument, especially when it comes to your loved ones.

Make your point and be sure that you (and your opponent) are heard. Having a true understanding of another's concerns are what will build your relationship and hopefully make them stress-free.

No matter where life takes you after Manhattan, it's important to remember the simple things in life and to not take things seriously.

The more fun you have, the more you embrace those things you truly want and the happier you likely are to be.

GUILTY PLEA IN CUBA PREVENTS TEST OF NEW TRIBUNAL SYSTEM

GUANTANAMO BAY,
Guba – David Hicks' guilty plea may send him home to Australia to serve his terrorism sentence, but it also short-circuits a fulf test of the new U.S. military thbunal system, which will have to handle more complicated cases in the future.

Not even the prosecution said Hicks' guilty plea Monday night was a victory for the revised Guantanamo Bay military tribunals, set up after the Supreme Court last summer ruled the Pentagon's previous system was unconstitutional.

with 31-year old Australian was the first detained to face trial under the Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed into law in October. But by pleading guilty at his arraignment to providing material support to terrorism, he deprived the tribunal system of a true road test — a trial.

ISRAELI, PALESTINIAN LEADERS TO RESUME POLITICAL TALKS

and Palestinian leaders will meet every two weeks for discussions aimed at paving the way for a final settlement to the Middle East conflict, officials said Tuesday, a small sign of momentum for the latest U.S. push to restart peace efforts.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the planned meetings at the end of a swing through the region, her fourth in as many months. Although the talks will begin with day-to-day issues, they signaled a deeper U.S. commitment to bringing the sides together after a six-year lull in peace efforts.

"The Israel's and Palestinians are taking the initial step on the path to peace, and the American role will include helping them to overcome obstacles, develop new ideas and rally international support for their efforts," she said.

Rice spoke after three days of shuttling between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. Relations between the men have worsened since Abbas, a moderate who favors peace talks, formed a coalition government with the Islamic militant group Hamas earlier this month.

BOMBS HIT MARKETS IN NORTHWEST IRAQI CITY, KILLING AT LEAST 63

BAGHDAD – Two truck bombs shattered markets in Tal Afar on Tuesday, killing at least 63 people and wounding dozens in the second assault in four days on a predominantly Shiite Muslim city hit by a resurgence in violence a year after it was held up as a symbol of U.S. success.

After the bombings, suspected Sunni insurgents tried to ambush ambulances carrying the injured out of the northwestern city but were driven off by police gunfire, Iraqi authorities said.

The carnage was the worst bloodshed in a day of attacks across Iraq.

Iraqi police reported at least 109 people killed or found dead nationwide. The toll included two elderly sisters – both Chaldean Catholic nuns in the increasingly tense city of Kirkuk – who were stabbed multiple times in what appeared to be a sectarian killing.

DEATHS OF REFUGEES OFF YEMENI COAST UNDERSCORE CRISIS

SAN'A, Yemen - The deaths of at least 31 people forced overboard in stormy seas - some stabbed, raped or beaten with clubs - illustrates a growing security problem in the pirate- and smuggler-infested waters between Yemen and Somalia.

The problem is likely to worsen, the U.N. says, as thousands of desperate Somalis try to escape the poverty and turmoil in their country.

Ethiopia sent troops into Somalia in December to protect the internationally backed government, which was battling Islamic militants. The situation has remained chaotic, leaving many people desperate to get away and at the mercy of human smugglers.

Does the corruption go even deeper? Theft of services, embezzlement, criminal conspiracy to cover up, lying to the public? Tampering with evidence? Obstruction of justice? Is there a Manhattan mafia? Was there favoritism shown? Who is covering up for whom?

Days of foreign respect for U.S. are over

Editor,

The unfortunate thing we must now come to terms with is that the era of the United States is over. The 20th century was the American century. Really, this was the era of our glory days. But like the sun fading across the western horizon, its last rays piercing the impending night, the days of an indivisible, influential United States are over.

I think soon the South will realize it was shafted and cut off for good. Hopefully Southern California will

This will leave the rest of the country wondering how this came to pass.

How could we never even have noticed the signs? How did we help this awful twisting of the American dream become a reality, and could we have stopped it? America has become the cynical, twisted old man who stands in the corner of life and mumbles about this and that and shouts obscenities while the rest of the world goes about its business. They have learned to ignore his requests with automatic efficiency and have pushed him into obscurity like a homeless man on a street corner.

All the while, citizens bank on immortality, refusing to acknowledge the impending death of their beloved, and the fact that it is they who are pulling the plug, or probably just tripping over the cord.

Bike riding can improve endurance

Spend less to park on campus and find a spot more easily, all while burning a few extra calories.

Build muscle and increase bone mass while reducing stress - it's your chance to embrace a new and challenging type of exercise. Don't "walk it out," this summer. Peddle it out.

The Aerobic and Fitness Association of America describes cycling as an ideal exercise that can meet most individual fitness goals. According to the AFAA, it can offer someone the opportunity to experience the extreme challenge of taking it to the limit, reaching his or her highest goal in a workout.

According to the AFAA, the benefits of cycling can include a strengthened heart, improved cardiorespiratory endurance, lowered blood pressure and an increased metabolism - all of which would make a great start to looking and feeling healthier as the weather gets Cycling is a cross-training variation of exercise that enhances individuals of all fitness levels. It allows participants to adjust intensity levels and degrees of resistance to match abilities. It is a low-impact, non-weight-bearing sport, excellent for post-rehabilitation exercise and an alternative for overuse injuries.

"Anyone can do it," said Lora Yoakum, a senior in finance who has been a cycle instructor for five months and a fitness instructor for five years. "It is intense, and with the right amount of motivation - and good music, of course - it can leave participants with a solid cardio workout.

"I think it's a fabulous crosstraining activity for runners. If you are willing to take up the challenge, cycling is effective and beneficial to everyone."

William R. Dall Acqua, a doctoral candidate in plant pathology and a graduate research assistant at K-State, has been a cycle instructor for eight months and has participated in indoor cycling for more than three years. He finds both biking and cycling beneficial.

"Indoor cycling and biking share common features such as providing a good aerobic exercise, working the major muscles of your body and burning lots of calories," Dall said. "Outdoor biking is just as good, but at times, adverse whether will prohibit the road.

"I like both, given the fact that I consider biking and indoor cycling a stress relief and a therapy. My favorite part about either is the climbing challenge. A lot of strength is needed, and it really gets the blood pumping at high gear."

Collin Baldwin, a senior in nutrition and exercise science and a cycle instructor for eight months, said he agreed.

"Although biking may seem easy for someone," Baldwin said, "I promise that you can make an outdoor bike ride challenging."

Biking is not only a way to challenge your body but can serve as a low stress exercise for those in recovery or reoccurring pain.

"If someone has pain or frequent problems with their feet or knees due to running or taking land aerobics, getting off their feet and on to a bike would help tremendously," Baldwin said. "The best part of cycling or biking is the randomness and ability to change up the workout. It can be something new and exciting each time you do it so you won't become bored with the workout."

Wildcats travel to Wyoming for 2nd WNIT semifinal game

By Jessi Hernandez KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After struggling through the mire of conference play earlier this season, the Wildcats now find themselves in familiar territory. For the second year in a row, K-State has reached the semifinals of the Women's National Invitation Tournament.

The Wildcats (19-14) cruised to a 67-54 quarterfinal victory over Auburn on Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum and will travel today to Laramie, Wyo., to face the Cowgirls.

K-State and Wyoming met once previously this season, a dramatic 68-62 overtime win at Bramlage on Nov. 17. In that game, Wyoming held a 55-52 lead with 1.3 seconds remaining in regulation when sophomore Marlies Gipson inbounded the ball to senior Claire Coggins, who connected on a 50-footer to beat the buzzer and send the game into over-

Since then, the Cowgirls (25-9) finished with an 11-5 record in the Mountain West Conference, good enough to tie for second place. Junior Hanna Zavecz leads the team in scoring, averaging 13.6 points per game. Junior Justyna Podziemska is second in scoring with 12.8 points per game and leads in rebounds with 6.4 per game.

K-State, which didn't have quite the same good fortune during the regular season (the Wildcats finished last in the Big 12 Conference with a 4-12 record), is on the upswing. Coach Deb Patterson's excitement has increased noticeably throughout the duration of the WNIT, especially during the Auburn game, junior Kimberly Dietz said.

"This is by far the most excited she's ever been," Dietz said. "We love it. We just bring so much intensity, and we love to see it on the sideline, because she's our head coach, and when she's pumped, we're pumped."

K-State, which has appeared twice before in the WNIT, boasts a 9-1 overall record in the tournament and has won its past eight games, including the 2006 championship.

This year, the Wildcats defeated Southern Illinois and Illinois before taking on Auburn. All three of those games were played at Bramlage, but the players said they are not too concerned about being able to maintain their intensity on the road.

"After playing at home for a while, it's going to be tough," said freshman Ashley Sweat. "I'm sure our road record isn't exactly what we would like it to be, but we're going to try to change that. We're going to try to bring the same aggression that we've brought, but it's going to be tougher in a different atmosphere."

Sophomore Shalee Lehning, who nearly earned the second triple-double of her career Sunday with nine points, nine rebounds and eight assists, said she is just as motivated to perform in front of an unfriendly crowd.

Should the Wildcats' season end tonight, Patterson said she would not be disappointed.

"If we lose the next game, it's going to be because someone's better than us or they were better that night," she said. "I could put my head on the pillow and feel great about this basketball team right now."

Tonight's winner will advance to face the winner of Western Kentucky at Wisconsin. K-State's only non-conference loss this season was to Wisconsin, 56-53, on Nov. 24.

And with the new focus comes a change in Prince is planning on employing a 3-4 defeh-sive front as K-State's base defense, in contrast to last season's 4-3 look.

Though the Wildcats won't play strictly 3-4 all the time, expect them to play the majorityof snaps with three down lineman and four linebackers on the field. "One of the things that the 3-4 does for you, it gives you a chance to have an extra secondlevel defender against these spread offenses,*Prince said. "I think the thing that intrigues .... most people about the 3-4 is the ability to blizz-out of it."

When Prince was on coach Al Groh's staff at Virginia, he also used the 3-4. However, that does not mean K-State will stray from what worked a year ago.

John Coval, 2006 K-State graduate, runs on the track Feb. 20, 2006, at Memorial Stadium. Memorial Stadium offers a variety of areas to exercise.

And there are other options.

Though jogging is not everyone's favorite exercise, its health benefits are hard to ignore. Jogging is a quick way to increase your heart rate, helping you to burn calories and fat. It's also cheap. Get yourself a good pair of running shoes, and you're ready to go. Change your course often to stay interested, and if jogging is difficult, walking briskly is almost as good.

If these aren't enough for you, ride or run down to the Natatorium and swim a few laps in the pool. I know it's not technically outside, but outdoor pools will open soon. So get a head start on your summer swimming workout. Besides, swimming is a great aerobic and resistance workout. If you find you're a strong swimmer and enjoy cycling and running, too, you might want to check out the Flint Hills Triathlon in June.

For a more team-oriented approach, check out the upcoming intramural activities at the rec. You can join teams for sports like softball, doubles tennis and four-on-four sand volleyball, just to name a few.

Whatever you decide to do, make the most of the beautiful weather, and get active outside. Information about the Natatorium or intramural sports are available on the Recreational Services Web site at recservices.k-state.edu.

Falling short

Primary care practitioners' incomes do not increase at same rate as specialists' incomes

By Lacey D. Mackey KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The income of a primary care physician is significantly below those of many specialists, and the gap is widening, according to the article "The Primary Care-Specialty Income Gap: Why It Matters" published in the Feb. 20 edition of the Annals of Internal Medicine.

The article cites surveys, conducted by the Medical Group Management Association, that indicate the median physician income for primary care increased 9.9 percent from 2000 to 2004, compared to a 15.8-percent increase for non-primary care specialists.

The article poses the question, "Does this income gap matter? Yes, although incomes of primary care physicians are far higher than the earnings of most persons in the United States, and the public has little sympathy for physicians who cry poor, the lower income of primary care physicians is a major factor leading U.S. medical students to reject primary care careers."

In 2005, the percentage of U.S. medical graduates choosing family medicine decreased from 14 percent to 8 percent, according to the article.

"With a median debt of $120,000 for public and $160,000 for private medical schools, medical students are further discouraged from choosing careers in primary care because of noncompetitive income," the article states.

SALARIES FOR PRIMARY CARE POINT TO FLAWS

Dr. Scott Moser, associate professor and vice chair for Education in the Department Family and Community Medicine at the University of Kansas School of Medicine Wichita, said the income gap between family medicine and other specialists is a con-

"I think that it speaks to the brokenness of our current medical system in this country," he said.

One difficulty family medical professionals address is the variety of health needs patients bring to the examination room.

"We deal with patients that are quite complex with undifferentiated problems, on the edges of standard care," Moser said. "It's a challenging profession.

"However, our current reimbursement system in this country pays better for 'procedural-type' medicine than for a 'thinking-type' medicine."

Moser said medical schools across the country have struggled to cultivate student interest in the primary care specialties - family medicine, general internal medicine and general pediat-

"There has been a decline, although the University of Kansas has a good track record of turning out primary care physicians, including family physicians," he said. "We have been a little less impacted than other parts of the country, and I think part of that is selecting students who are altruistic to begin with, and that's an important part. You have to be dedicated to a life of service."

As baby-boomer physicians begin to retire, a need for health-care professionals also will increase, he said.

Although the income, especially for primary care and family medicine, might not be enticing at the moment, Moser said the situation would not remain in its current state.

"It will change," Moser said.

"My hope is that we can have a negotiated change without a major crisis having to develop. I think that the long-range future for family medicine is really very bright - there are students who see that future and see that is what they want to do as phy-

"In the immediate future, there's been this widening gap, but I believe that is only going to be temporary."

Kelsey Harpster, senior in biology and minor in women's studies, said she has heard about the decrease of primary care practitioners directly from physicians in the field - professionals who are encouraging her to find another occupation.

"A lot of them will tell me, 'Get out while you still can," she said. "One thing that I think sometimes is that if I was really smart, why didn't I go into business? You really have to have the heart for it or you're going to be sorely disappointed."

Among premedical students, Harpster said her peers think highly of primary care practitioners, even if they do not plan to study in the field.

"I think lately, there's been an understanding among people that it's one of the hardest residences to do because anything can walk into the office that day," she said

"They have a lot of respect for it, but that's not where the money lies."

Despite the relatively low income that primary care doctors receive compared to specialists, Harpster said she still wants to be a general practitioner.

"I thought I wanted to be specialty, but because there's a shortage, I felt more of a need to help," she said.

Generally, undergraduate students do not know about the shortage of primary care physicians unless they hail from a small community, said Susan Watt, adviser of prehealth studies.

Because of the expense associated with medical school, Watt said she talks to many students about the Kansas Medical Student Loan Program at the University of Kansas' School of Medicine. The program encourages students to practice primary care in Kansas. The loan pays for the medical student's tuition and living expenses in exchange for the student's agreement to practice medicine in Kansas for each year they attend medical school at KU.

Although KU offers the loan to encourage students to study primary care, many premedical students come into undergraduate school already with a sense of where they want to be and what they want to study, Watt said.

LOW WAGES DO NOT DISCOURAGE STUDENTS

Snyder, Laura K-State graduated from in December, said she wanted to be a primary care practitioner, particularly a pediatrician, after shadowing other doctors.

But Snyder, who plans to attend Oklahoma State College University Osteopathic Medicine in fall 2007, said she knows that decision will not be the most financially beneficial.

"It's kind of unfair almost," she said. "I'm primary care so I'll probably be making about $150,000, which might seem like a lot to others, but if I was a cardiologist, I'd be getting about $500,000."

Snyder said she thought the lower income did not matter as much to females compared to males considering medicine as a profession.

While men might feel the pressure to be the main provider in a family, Snyder said many women do not necessarily think about income. This is one reason

Primary care incomes

From 2000 to 2004, the median income for physicians increased. Here is a breakdown according to Annals of Internal Medicine:

Family practice physicians 7.5 percent to $156,000

Hematologists and oncologists 35.6 percent to $350,000

Diagnostic radiologists 36.2 percent to $407,000

Invasive cardiologists 16.9 percent to $428,000

In 2004

- 15 percent of family practice physicians earned less than
- 20 percent of invasive cardiologists, 25 percent of neurosurgeons and 14 percent of orthopedists had incomes of $600,000 or more.

Snyder said she thought many women choose to stay in primary care.

Since her choice to stay in primary care, some people in the professional field have questioned Snyder's decision not to pick a better-paying field of medicine.

But Snyder said she still is set on studying family medicine.

Although medical students might not understand the exact incomes of various fields of medicine and allow that to affect their decisions, many know the financial issues, Snyder said.

"I'm sure it's in the back of everybody's mind," she said.

Community members vie for city commission seats

Retired police officer seeks to represent 'silent majority' of people in Manhattan

By Salena Strate KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bill Reece declared his candidacy in the last hour of the last filing day, Jan. 23. He is the only retired candidate for city commission.

"I don't know if I fit the mold of a typical politician," said Reece, a 1988 K-State graduate in social science. "I'm retired, so I have no connection to any work force in Manhattan. This was one of the reasons I decided to declare my candidacy."

He said there are many retirees in Manhattan, and it is time to have representation on the commission. Reece said he was surprised by the number of retirees he found by going door to door with his cam-the safety of students." Reece said.

He said he agreed with the Clean Air Act but wanted to put it on a ballot for voters to decide. Reece also said he is in favor of the downtown redevelopment act but wanted to pay attention to excess spending. Another one of Reece's concerns is property tax inflation.

Reece served as a police officer in Manhattan after serving more than 20 years in the army. He and his wife have traveled to all 48 contiguous states, mostly by riding their Harley-Davidson motorcycles.

"I encourage students to get involved with politics now because it's always been my opinion if you don't vote, you don't know what's going on in your community," Reece said.

K-State history professor plans to rely on student connection during election

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Sherow, associate professor of history, works with students every day and said he will use that experience to serve Manhattan and K-State students if he is elected city commissioner in April.

"I've been heavily involved in community activities for quite some time and I think that I have some knowledge that could prove helpful in terms of where the community is going right now," he said. "There are just a lot of issues that I'd like to get right on the table and deal

Issues in his platform include a public smoking ban and rental property inspections.

For example, soldiers only can use their housing allowances on properties that have been inspected by Fort Riley or

"Some university towns, as part of the student fees, let students ride public transportation anywhere in town at any time and that is what I want to see

Democratic senate votes to preserve troops withdrawal deadline

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON Democratic-controlled ate narrowly signaled support Tuesday for the withdrawal of U.S. combat troops from Iraq by next March.

The vote triggered an instant veto threat from the White House in a deepening dispute between Congress and commander in chief.

Republican attempts to scuttle the nonbinding time failed on a vote of 50-48, largely along party lines.

Sens. Gordon Smith of Oregon and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska - called "two brave Republicans" by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid after the vote - joined Democrats in opposing the amendment.

The roll call marked the Senate's most forceful challenge to date of the administration's handling of the war. It came days after the House approved a binding withdrawal deadline of Aug. 31, 2008.

"This is a strong message which amplifies the action of the House and reflects the overwhelming sentiment of the American people," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-Rhode Island. "It's a message that must be heeded by the president and by the government of Iraq."

Three months after Democrats took power in Congress, Reid said the moment was right to "send a message to President Bush that the time has come to find a new way forward in this intractable war."

But Republicans - and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, an independent Democrat - argued otherwise.

John McCain, R-Arizona, a presidential hopeful, said that 'we are starting to turn things around" in the Iraq war and that a timeline for withdrawal would embolden the terrorists in Iraq and elsewhere.

The effect of the timeline would be to "snatch defeat from the jaws of progress in Iraq," agreed Lieberman.

Bush had previously said he would veto any bill that he deemed an attempt to micromanage the war, and the White House freshened the threat a few hours before the vote - and again afterward.

"The president is disappointed that the Senate continues down a path with a bill that he will veto and has no chance of becoming law," it said.

The administration contends that setting a timetable on the war assumes failure in "This and other provisions would place freedom and democracy in Iraq at grave risk, embolden our enemies and undercut the administration's plan to develop the Iraqi economy," the White House said in a statement before the vote.

The $122 billion bill would fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan but order Bush to begin bringing some troops home right away, with the goal of ending combat missions by March 31, 2008.

The bill is similar to one the House passed last week, but with a tougher deadline. While the Senate identifies March 2008 as a goal -- giving the president leeway to ignore the deadline -- the House voted 218-212 to require all combat troops out as of August 31,

On March 15, the Senate rejected by a 50-48 vote a resolution calling for troops to leave by March 2008. Republican Smith of Oregon sided with Democrats in support of the measure, but Sens. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Mark Pryor of Arkansas opposed announcing a timetable for withdrawal.

Professor invited to NYSE

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One K-State professor stood on the same podium as many celebrities and big business owners for the ringing of the New York Stock Exchange bell March 6.

John Graham, professor of business, was part of a group from Tortoise Capital Resources Corporation invited to ring the bell, signifying the start of the day at the stock exchange.

The members of the company were invited because they had a successful public offering of stock that lifted it on the exchange, Graham

Although Graham did not ring the bell himself, he said being on the podium and looking over the several hundred people on the trading floor was a memorable experience, as was being on television.

"My sons taped it as my 10 seconds of fame in 61 years," Graham said. "I would view it as a once in a lifetime experience for someone like me."

Graham said he was unaware he would be on the podium until the morning of the ringing, which he said went by very quickly.

"We had breakfast, and they walked us up to the podium literally three minutes before we were to start," he said.

Graham received his undergraduate degree in 1967 from K-State and began work as K-State's dean of graduate programs in 1970. He left the university in 1978 and became CEO of Farm Bureau Insurance Company.

Graham is teaching at K-State while serving as an independent board member for Tortoise Capital Resources Corporation.

Graham called the invite to the NYSE a big honor for the company.

"It's generally something that is rare because obviously there are only so many companies that can be invited," he said.

"But I think you would find that most of the leading companies listed on the NYSE have been invited to ring the bell sometime during their existence."

This experience in New York will be one he remembers forever, Graham said.

"I knew it would be an interesting and fun experience, and I found it definitely was," he said. "Part of it was being in the heart of what's known as not only the world's largest stock market, but as the world's most effective pricediscovery mechanism."

K-State organization to sponsor entrepreneurship symposium

By Brett King KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will be host to a symposium for high school students today in the K-State Student Union. The College of Business Administration and Students in Free Enterprise organized the event to promote entrepreneurship.

Former K-State football coach Bill Snyder will deliver the keynote address. He will discuss the importance of leadership.

Most of the events are closed to the public. However, Matt Spencer, public relations chair for SIFE and senior in marketing, said the event will be open to the everyone during the Snyder speech that will be from 9 to 10:15 a.m., and the entrepreneur presentation from 3:30 to 3:45 p.m. Both events will be in the Union Ballroom.

Spencer said the symposium will include breakout sessions discussing many different topics. The first session will be an introduction to diversity in the workplace, with emphasis on addressing stereotypes.

The second breakout session will challenge participants to create and market a product using materials which are provided to develop skills for international marketing.

Larissa Noonan, future president of SIFE and graduate student in business administration, said the organization will award a scholarship to the group with the best product and marketing scheme.

The final breakout session will cover financial literacy, focusing on credit cards and how compound interest can affect a person's financial standing in the future.

According to the SIFE Web site, SIFE is a non-profit organization that gives students the tools to learn the free enterprise system in a working situation.

Spencer said the hope of SIFE is to help students take lessons they learn in the classroom and apply them in bettering their communities.

"SIFE promotes market economics, success skills, entrepreneurship, financial literacy and business ethics," Spencer said.

Noonan said SIFE is not just an organization for students in the College of Business Administration but all majors at K-State.

House GOP's health plan to help low-income residents pay for alternative to Medicaid

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Kansas would move toward helping needy residents purchase private insurance rather than paying directly for their medical services and nursing home care under a sweeping plan drafted by House Republicans.

But criticism from other legislators and officials led Republican leaders to cancel a House debate Tuesday and send the bill containing the plan to committee.

The measure represented the year's major health care initiative from the House's GOP majority.

Speaker Melvin Neufeld said the measure isn't dead for the session and that the Legislature needs to make progress on health care issues this year.

But he said too many people were confused about the bill's contents.

"That's the problem," said Neufeld, R-Ingalls. "That's the reason we need to slow down and take a better look."

The bill would overhaul the state's $1.3 billion Medicaid program, which reimburses doctors, clinics, hospitals and others for providing care to some 250,000 poor and disabled Kansans a month.

Marcia Nielsen, executive director of the Kansas Health Policy Authority, an agency formed in 2005 to review health issues and make policy recommendations, called the bill "loosely worded and poorly explained." The authority also administers Medicaid jointly with the federal government.

"It's a mess," she said of the bill during an interview. "It's turning Medicaid on its head, without evidence that it needs to be turned on its head."

Many legislators saw rising medical and health insurance costs as among the most pressing issues they faced when the session began in January.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius also called on them to draft a plan for eventually bringing universal health coverage to Kansas.

Like other legislators, House Republicans say their goals are to give needy Kansans more choices about their health care, reduce the number of uninsured Kansans, make the health insurance market more competitive and control costs for consumers and the state.

But Republicans have resisted Sebelius' call for universal coverage because many worry about expanding state government's reach.

"We need to make health care more affordable for all Kansans – the commercial side," said Rep. Jeff Colyer, R-Overland Park, a doctor who led the GOP task force drafting the plan. "We need to reform Medicaid."

He added: "We need to work on a transition from Medicaid and the uninsured into more stable, private insurance, and we need to do some things for the uninsured."

But the authority complained that the House Republicans' plan would require it to conduct 10 studies, establish four pilot programs and file nine requests with federal officials for them to waive rules governing Medicaid, which is funded and administered jointly by states and federal government.

And Nielsen questioned whether turning to the private market could help some of the targeted Kansans.

For example, the bill sets a goal of phasing out Medicaid payments for nursing home care and replacing them with long-term care insurance coverage in five years.

"People who are already in long-term care facilities couldn't possibly find a private long-term care insurance provider," she said. "If they could there's no way that it would be affordable."

House Minority Leader Dennis McKinney said Kansans who are on Medicaid or without insurance aren't in the health insurance market because companies do not believe insuring them is profitable.

"The only way you get a plan adopted and start making meaningful changes is when you have bipartisan buy-in and you work with all the stakeholders," said McKinney, D-Greensburg.

"That did not happen on this bill."

City of Manhattan encourages residents to clean houses, yards

By Brian Tosh KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For many, spring cleaning can be a daunting task, considering how much trash can accumulate during the winter. Manhattan residents have several options to dispose of trash, junk, yard waste and hazardous

For yard waste and general trash. Manhattan's annual Spring Clean-Up event will be April 2-6.

The city is encouraging area homeowners to take advantage of this annual opportunity to clean house and dispose of their refuse.

"We've been doing the cleanup now for over 15 years," said Jeff Walters, Manhattan public works superintendent. "We have had a very good response to this event in the past, and usually haul off several hundred truck loads of lawn waste alone."

The event is made possible through a partnership between the city and four local refuse contractors

Manhattan residents with a contract for trash removal can have their additional trash collected during the regularly scheduled collection time.

"This event is meant for people who are trying to clean out their attics or get rid of other excess trash," Walters said. "It is not meant for someone who has just demoed their garage and wants the debris hauled tion crews throughout the week to handle the larger amounts of lawn waste typically accumulated in the spring.

The crews will service a different area of Manhattan each day during the event.

All yard waste, limbs and branches must be placed on the curb by 8 a.m. the day of each area's scheduled pickup. A map is available on the city's Web site, www.ci.manhattan.ks.us, showing which part of the city is designated for each day. Guidelines for trash items also can be found on the Web site.

"Any leaves or lawn clippings must be placed in paper lawn waste bags that can be purchased at a number of different locations," Walters said. "If it's not in a lawn waste bag, we will be unable to pick it up."

Some materials require spe-The city will send out collec- cial treatment. Refuse contractors will not accept tires, batteries, concrete or rock rubble. construction debris, major household appliances and hazardous waste including pesticides, herbicides, lubricants, paint and paint thinners.

All hazardous chemicals must be taken to the Riley County Household Hazardous Waste facility. The facility was created after a groundwater contamination incident at the Riley County landfill in 1989.

"There is no cost for disposing of hazardous materials for any Manhattan homeowner." said Dennis Peterson, director of the facility. "We were the first facility of our kind in the state of Kansas and have really been pioneers in the field of waste disposal!

To help prevent further contamination, refuse collectors will not collect any trash during the Spring Clean-Up that appears to contain hazardous materials.

"We've been offering this service since 1990, but people have still been throwing out things that they shouldn't," Peterson said.

Manhattan residents who have recyclable materials are encouraged to take them to a local recycling center. Major household appliances also may be taken to the Riley County Household Hazardous Waste facility for recycling.

Some unwanted items might have some life in them yet, and the United Way of Riley County is trying to direct those donations to local organizations that could use them. The agency's Web site, www.unitedwayrc. org, features a Wishbook, which outlines donation requests from local social service agencies.

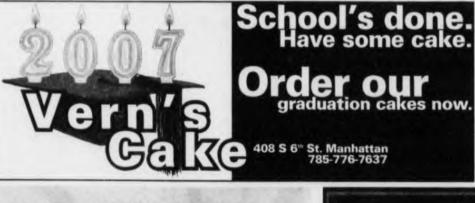

'Typically, we contact all the nonprofit agencies in Manhattan and ask them exactly what they need," said Maxine Coffey, executive director of the United Way of Manhattan. "We've helped people donate everything from furnaces to furni-

The United Way office does not actually accept donations, but instead places donors in contact with other agencies.

"With the Wishbook, it's very easy for people to look at the index and then donate directly to the agency in need," Coffey said.

Even if an item is not on the list, the United Way encourages donors to call and see if an agency could have a use for their item.

"Agencies that provide youth services could always use something like a pool or ping-pong table, and agencies that provide shelter are always in need of household and baby supplies," Coffey said. "We can really find a use for just about anything."

A string quartet of K-State students will perform in Aggieville tonight.

The Manhattan Project String Quartet will play at Radina's Coffeehouse and Roastery from 8 to 10 p.m. The performance is one of the live music shows featured at Radina's every Wednesday, said barista Heather Parker.

The quartet's members are Robyn Bramlage, sophomore in graphic design, and Laura Beth Cochran, sophomore in architecture, who both play violin; Cody Toll, sophomore in music education, who plays the viola; and Ransom Allen, sophomore in music education, who plays the cello.

Bramlage, who has played the violin for 10 years, said the foursome knew each other last year while playing in the KSU Symphony Orchestra. She said Cora Cooper, professor of music, suggested they form a quartet and became their coach.

The group practices at least twice a week, Bramlage said, with Cooper at one of the two practices.

"If we have a gig coming up, we'll meet extra," she said. "It's kind of as needed."

Cochran said the group's name, which comes from the secret World War II research program that invented the atomic bomb, was Allen and Toll's idea.

Cochran said they began playing as a group at the start of last semester.

The quartet plays occasional events, Cochran said, including weddings. She said they played at a luncheon Tuesday.

Cochran said she has played the violin since she was 5 years old.

"It offers an artistic release from my other responsibilities," she said.

The group worked on music by the composer Hayden last semester and music by the composer Schubert this semester, Cochran said. She said tonight's performance will include classical music as well as some Beatles tunes and Irish music.

Erica Smith, freshman in English literature and creative writing, attends the live shows every Wednesday and said they usually feature folk music or solo guitarists. She said she hopes for something soothing and upbeat, but doesn't know what to ex-

"It's a really intimate setting, so it's great," Smith said. "You can get some coffee or read a book or do homework and listen to the music."

San Jose State student overcomes prank

By Madeline Ward THE DAILY CAMPUS

STORRS, Conn. - Imagine for a second that one of the most horrifying or embarrassing moments of your life were caught on camera. Now imagine it all over the Internet.

Every day, many people have these candid moments and elaborate pranks broadcast on sites like my Dailymontion.com or MySpace.com.

Christian Uhtof, an 18year-old freshman at San Jose State University went through

In the video, Donald Jiang claimed that Uhtof had game" and "couldn't get girls so he dated online." To prove this he invented a fake Myspace profile of a girl named Heather as well as a fake AOL Instant Messenger account and proceeded to seduce the unsuspecting Uhtof. This went on for five months in which time Jiang and five of his other friends decided everything that Heather would say and do. The whole project was called "Operation Make Chris Cry."

Uhtof was convinced that Heather was a close friend of his and he even went so far as to share intimate details about his life with Jiang.

After five months, Jiang thought it was time for Heather to make an appearance. In October of last year, Jiang sent Uhtof a message that he should come to a Halloween party dressed as the Incredible Hulk. Jiang stalked him from a nearby car with his camera and left a pair of panties on the door as a gift for him with the note to come back later.

Later, the video shows Uhtof walking up the stairs of Heather's house, covered head to toe in green paint, wearing cutoff jeans, all ready to take her out on their first date. He didn't find Heather but found Jiang wrapped in a blanket. Uhtof was surrounded by four laughing strangers, Jiang and a person he had known from grade school.

"I still couldn't believe it." said Uhtof. "I couldn't believe what happened. I was shellshocked. I am not a religious person really, but I was praying to Jesus, God, or whoever to get me out of there."

Ultimately "Operation Make Chris Cry" failed to make Chris cry and instead it had quite to opposite effect.

"I've accepted it," said Uh-

For him, the aftermath of the video has been a strange, humorous experience at best.

"I get friend requests from people on Myspace. It's just one of those things?

The video was shared over the Myspace-community. The Chris Uhtof not seen in the video, which is over laced with comments about him being an introverted game addict and having only online girls, is a far cry from the real Chris.

"I like rock climbing, biking, hiking - anything to do with the outdoors," Uhtof

While he does play video games, he says "they aren't his Though his nickname is "the champ" from his days playing "Halo," his favorite game right now is not on any Xbox or PlayStation.

"I play Texas Hold'em. I used to play in a hat and glasses, but now I just do it without, because I have a stone-cold poker face."

He is currently a pre-med major at San Jose University and works as a cashier at Hol-Uhtof offers this advice when asked of what he thought of the video.

"It happens. The main thing in life is not to take revenge. I didn't want to seek revenge on them. I am not one of those kinds of people," he said.

KU students become 'homeless' for break

By Tyler Harbert UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN

LAWRENCE - Most students would rather spend spring break on a sunny beach or in an exotic foreign country.

University of Kansas students Corey Sielaff, junior, and Andy Whitehead, freshman, opted to spend their week sleeping on cardboard boxes in an abandoned bus station in downtown Washington, D.C., while Jonathan Evenson, senior, decided he wanted to clean out flooded houses in Buras, La.

Living homeless for two days and volunteering in crisis-areas are just a few activities offered by the Alternative Breaks program, which puts students in service-oriented positions in cities throughout the country.

Washington, D.C., The program, in conjunction with the National Coalition for the Homeless, allows students to travel to Washington, D.C., and spend several days working in the world's largest homeless shelter before getting tossed to the streets for two days.

"The goal is to go through the daily struggle that the homeless go through," Sielaff said.

Part of that struggle involves panhandling, eating at soup kitchens, finding places to sleep and for most of the time during the 48-hour excursion, killing time.

"Being homeless was boring," Sielaff said. "Really boring and cold."

Meanwhile, Evenson and six other students packed a van to Louisiana where they spent seven days working in a community soup kitchen and cleaning flood-ravished homes. He spent seven nights sleeping in a tent city outside of a gutted YMCA building.

Evenson lived in Louisiana for three years but said he had not been to the area since it was hit by Hurricane Katrina nearly two years ago.

"It was kind of shocking to see what was destroyed and what was left," he said. "I was pretty worn out physically and emotionally."

Sielaff and Whitehead, along with Mitch Voth, sophomore, stayed together as a group while they were homeless in Washington, D.C. A total of six students went on that trip.

They worked with a guide, a former homeless person named David, who made sure they were safe and shared with them some of his three-year homeless experiences.

Knowing he would spend two days homeless in Washington, D.C., was what drew Whitehead to the Alternative Breaks program.

"I thought, 'Wow, that's kind of a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," he said.

To enroll in the program, students must submit an application, attend a series of interviews, rank their desired destinations and then take a weekly Alternative Breaks course.

Sielaff said it cost $225 to enroll in the program, which covered food and a stay at a men's transitional care service institute for the nights when the students were not sleeping on the streets.

Both Sielaff and Whitehead said the most important part of their trip was their interaction with homeless people.

"My main goal is to teach and that's obviously a personto-person job," Sielaff said.

Jobs report shows U.S. students earn fewer degrees

By Alan Wheeler DAILY NEBRASKAN

LINCOLN, Neb. - A trend in global academia has many U.S. college officials worried.

Americans are falling behind other developed nations in earning college degrees, according to report released by Jobs for the Future, a Bostonbased research organization.

According to the report, "Hitting Home: Quality, Cost and Access Challenges Confronting Higher Education Today," if the trend continues, the United States will have 15.6 million fewer bachelor's and associate's degree holders than it needs to keep up with its top economic competitors in 2025.

The report says higher education systems and institutions need to take measures to be more cost-effective and cooperate more with elementary and secondary schools.

To ensure the United States avoids the gloomy forecast, degree production needs to increase by more than 37 percent, which means graduating more students who are members of minority groups, from low-income families or beyond the traditional college age, the cellor for student affairs at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln said he was worried.

"All citizens should be concerned that as a nation we are falling behind other countries in the percentage of the population with college degrees," Franco wrote.

Barbara Couture, senior vice chancellor for academic affairs, said she thinks the trend is an indicator of more than just the United States falling behind but also of other nations catch-

Both Couture and Franco, however, believe there is one crucial element to reversing this trend - improving high school recruitment.

"It is clear that we need to improve the percentage of high school students going on to college," Franco said. "Universities in general do a good job of recruiting the top students, such as merit scholars. But they need to do a better job of helping the next level of very capable students access higher education."

Couture said this shows how the global economy is affecting the country.

"The signal this report sends to us is that we need to tell our youth that having a degree is going to make them more competitive," she said.

skin's transition into springtime

By Megan Molitor KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ah, warm weather. The time finally has come for less clothing, more time lounging outside, and cracked, dry skin.

Mother Nature has a few ways of making us pay for all that fun in the sun, one of which is having skin lacking the moisture it needs to look and feel good in summer attire.

So what's a girl or guy to do? Lather up. Moisturizing with lotion daily can help to curb flaky summer skin. But with so many options and price ranges, picking the right one can be tricky. Is forgoing the more expensive, big-name brand for the generic version worth the few dollars you could save? That's just what I intended to find out when I tested two different lotions, both advertising to have the same effect on skin.

The first one I purchased was Jergens Soothing Aloe Relief, equipped with "natural aloe, cucumber and eucalyptus." For the 12.5-ounce bottle, it cost $3.42 at Wal-Mart.

The generic brand I purchased was Suave Aloe with Cucumber, which promised to "soothe and comfort with botanicals." A 10-ounce bottle cost $1.70.

My process was to cleanly shave both legs, rub one lotion on each one, and wait for it to soak in. I based my comparison on three qualities: stickiness, softness, and scent.

THE STICK

At first touch, they felt about equal. But after waiting a few more minutes for in the Suave leg. It seemed to be a little more gooey to the touch and even more so on my fingers. The Jergens had a slight stick but felt great in comparison.

THE SOFTNESS

There's nothing like smooth legs to test softness on. I was determined not to have a tie, but after a long period of feeling strange caressing my own legs, I came to the conclusion that they both made my skin feel pretty darn good. I found nothing to complain about in this area.

THE AROMA

There's nothing worse than lotion that works great but smells like a mixture of coconuts and yesterday's trash. Luckily, neither one of these lotions had the trash factor, but one definitely won over the other. The Suave lotion smelled all right, but it had a more generic smell compared with the smooth, melon-like smell of the Jergens lotion. The smell itself made me want to touch the skin again.

The votes are in, and I have decided. It might be worth paying a couple extra bucks for the Jergens lotion.

My left leg felt great, and so I slathered some up on the other, and enjoyed the smooth feel for the rest of the day.

Men can get a variety of skin and nail services in Manhattan. Pedicures and manicures are available at Cali Nails in Manhattan Town Center Mall.

Common salon procedures also popular for men

Beauty secrets do not have to be for only one sex. Salons everywhere, including Manhattan, of fer services to fit both men's and women's needs, like at Trisha's Studio 24.

Not all men are unaware of what is available to them.

"We have a pretty good amount of males that come into this salon," said Lorien Davis, esthetician at Trisha's Studio 24. "Most of it is just for haircuts or tanning, but we do get a few once in a while for nails and facials, and quite a few for pedicures."

Davis said more men should take advantage of the beauty services at the salon, especially pedi-

She also advised men to consider getting facials, because skin care is always important. A facial is a process that cleanses, exfoliates and nourishes the skin in order to keep it smooth and hy-

Other salon employees in the area said they also had male clients, like Studio 32.

people we have come in are guys," said Verna Lee Hayes, employee of Studio 32.

She agreed most of them come in for haircuts but said a few come in for nail services.

"The ones that come in for these services are usually older men," Hayes said. "They also come in for hair color, and of course, manicures and pedicures."

Some college students have been awakened to the world of salon services, including Joel Campbell, sophomore in business.

Exhibition aims to inform public about people with disabilities

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An exhibition Wednesday in the K-State Student Union demonstrated what a few minutes in the life of a disabled person might be like.

Many organizations from around the university and the state displayed booths showing services provided to help people cope with disabilities at the K-State for All exhibition from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the Union Courtyard. The exhibition was part of K-State for All: Disabilities Week, a campaign to raise disability aware-

Among the members of the crowd were students, faculty and the reigning Miss Wheelchair Kansas, Lorraine Cannistra. She was on hand to offer her support for the day's

"I am here to let people know that people with disabilities are powerful and can do great things," Cannistra said.

At one table, Commerce Bank and the Union Program Council teamed up to provide stuffed bears to disabled children in the city.

Trini Najera, junior in hotel and restaurant management, was one of the student workers who ran the stuff-a-bear table.

"We are stuffing bears for children that have disabilities," Najera said about her table.

The bears will be given to three area children's foundations that were chosen by students from a list of potential recipients.

Participants could create the bears free of charge. Commerce Bank donated a little more than half of the funds needed to make the bears. The remainder of the money came from UPC.

To make a bear, people chose a shell of one of 10 different animals, stuffed it, placed a heart inside and dressed the bears.

Across from the bear table, a display showed modified tools disabled people can use to help them accomplish daily activities, including a rubber set of work gloves to aid people with weaker grips. Behind the tools, a display board compared pictures of types of farming tools.

Volleyball coach spends time in wheelchair, learns from disabled student

By Hannah Blick KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Suzie Fritz was first contacted about helping with K-State's inaugural Disabilities Week, her initial response was a hands-down agreement. Little did she know exactly what the planning committee had in mind for her.

Fritz, head coach of the K-State volleyball team, said she spent two hours trekking across campus in a wheelchair Wednesday morning to gain more insight into the everyday challenges faced by the disabled. The event was part of K-State for All: Disabilities Week.

Tim Hawkinson, sophomore in psychology, served as Fritz's tour guide for the morning. Hawkinson was paralyzed from mid-chest down in a 2001 diving accident and has spent the last five years using a motorized wheelchair for mobility.

As the two introduced themselves and made small talk, Fritz joked about her anxiety

"I have to admit, I was a little nervous." Fritz said. "But hopefully this will help to raise awareness around campus. It's just not something people think about very often - what it's like for disabled students,

Professors explore limiting cell phone use in class

By Sarah Rasmussen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In today's technologic setting, one item is increasingly prevalent: the cellular phone. Classrooms are full of them, and professors are tak-

There is no university rule that states cell phones are not allowed in classrooms. Therefore, professors and instructors are left to decide how they handle the use of phones during class. Some professors do not have any consequences for phones in class, but others enforce a wide range of punishments.

According to a news release from the Department of Hotel, Restauant, Institution Management and Dietetics on Feb. 17, Patrick Pesci, program director of the hotel and restaurant management program, has conducted etiquette workshops for more than 15 years and said he thinks cell phone usage might need to be added as a topic of discussion during the workshops.

"We have students that have their cell phones on constantly," Pesci said. "It's getting to the point where I have to announce in class to turn cell phones off or put them on vibrate and leave them in the students' backpacks. I do not want the cell phone out on the desk or table. It's a distraction."

Nora Ransom, English instructor, is one teacher who has specific consequences for those students whose cell phones ring in class.

"I tell students during the discussion of the course objectives that they are expected to behave professionally in my class, and professional behavior requires that they turn their cell phones off," Ransom said. "In addition, if a student's cell phone does ring in class, the student is to bring treats to the next class meeting. Typically, this is doughnuts or cookies, but the nutrition students often bring something healthy."

Caitlin Peterson, junior in secondary education, said she has not had to deal with any cell phone usage consequences, but she has known other students who have.

"I had a friend whose cell phone went off in Dr. Kelly Welch's class her freshman year, and Dr. Welch answered it," Peterson said.

Craig Parker, associate professor of music history and music, also takes a different approach to dealing with cell phones in class. He answers the student's phone if it rings and says whatever he wants - and vice versa. If his phone happens to ring during class, he gives it to a student to answer as he or she wants.

Parker said he typically only has one student per course who forgets to shut off a phone before class, and he never has had any repeat offenders. He also said he has never had a student put up a fight to hand over the phone, because they've been warned since the first day.

"Since in-state students at K-State pay approximately $18 for every 50-minute class session, I think it is the height of arrogance and insensitivity to disrupt everyone else's learning experience by letting one's cell phone ring during class," Parker

Clinical director dies March 22

By Kristen Roderick KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students walking into K-State's Clinical Services, Speech and Hearing Center find a bright, cheerful atmosphere.

The colorful furnishings and atmosphere now will help colleagues remember clinical director Julie Schraeder, who worked at the center for more than 10 years.

Schraeder

"She liked strong, definite colors," said Ann Smit, professor in communication services and disorders. "The clinic reflects that."

Schraeder, 53, died March 22 at her sister's home in Gering, Neb., of natural causes. She was a resident of Riley, Kan., and was born Feb. 6, 1954, in La Crosse, Kan.

"It's a terrible shock," Smit said. "She was here on Friday and not here the next Friday."

Colleagues said they will remember Schraeder as someone who was caring and knowledgeable. She knew many parts of speech pathology and worked with adults, school-aged children and people in hospitals, Smit said.

"We tend to have areas of specialization." Smit said. "I don't have the whole picture the way she did. She was very respectful of everyone and had a just gift of putting people at ease."

Linda Crowe, associate director of family studies and human services, said Schraeder had a loving and caring personality.

"She was always cheerful." Crowe said. "Even in times of adversity. She had that way of projecting kindness and empathy. She was a very sincere, honest person." Colleagues said they will remember Schraeder as someone who was dedicated to her work. "She gave us herself," Crowe said. "She provided expertise and years of experience. She was a great model for the students to know what a true professional looks like."

Barbara Weltsch, speech language pathologist and clinical instructor, said Schraeder made her want to come to work every day.

"She was creative and had a great sense of humor," Weltsch said. "She could tell any story and make it funny. She was a good listener and a good friend."

Crowe said though the center will fill Schraeder's position, no one can take her place as a person.

"She has left very big shoes to fill," Weltsch said. "It's going to be difficult to find someone to replace her. There will be someone who takes the position, but I don't think anyone will be able to replace her."

Those who knew Schraeder said she liked traveling with the K-State football team, participating in the community book club, swimming and attending music festivals.

"She loved music," Crowe said. "She would always go to the bluegrass and jazz festivals."

She is survived by her children, Flint Neidenthal, Columbia, Mo., Cole Neidenthal, senior in kinesiology at K-State, and Ashley Neidenthal, Andover, Kan.

New Jardine constructions to be completed by August

By Mike Kelly KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite questions concerning rising costs and community development, the Jardine redevelopment project continues as planned, and 295 new units will open this August.

"It's an anxious time, and I think we're ready to invite all of the new students to be part of Jardine," said Kathy Van Steenis, apartment area coordinator for the Jardine Apartment Complex.

The new apartments, which include 56 different floor plans, can accommodate up to 736 residents. Prices for the new apartments vary based on style. The least expensive apartment styles are one-bedroom apartments and studios, which will cost $467 per month. On the other extreme, a four-bedroom apartment costs $1,712 per month. Although the rates may seem high, Steenis said they are consistent with Manhattan's market and have been approved by the Kansas Board of Regents.

While discussing rent costs for the new apartments, Jardine coordinators performed a feasibility study that included interviewing students of multiple backgrounds and conducting focus groups of faculty and staff. From this, a financial pro forma was produced that established appropriate rent prices.

"The rents we have currently are in line with that and view the mix of units we pro forma," said Stephanie Bannister, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services. "We haven't had to raise those."

To allow for community members who cannot afford the new units, Jardine will offer both traditional and renovated units at low, below-market-value prices.

"The beautiful thing is that this gives us a pricing structure that ranges from our traditional units to the new units," Bannister said.

Jardine will open 11 traditional and eight renovated buildings, in which rent will not rise drastically, Bannister said

"Our traditional and our renovated rates have not risen significantly." Bannister said. "They have not even kept up with inflation and are priced below what the standard of living increase would be for our area."

In future phases of Jardine's development, Bannister said even more traditional buildings would be renovated, offering new threebedroom units that would be affordable to families while still priced below the market value of the area.

By August, all construction in progress and the first round of redevelopment will be complete. Banister said that after August, the project will be put on hold for a year to allow for evaluation and reflection

"It's a year to sit back have. During this time, we will conduct focus groups of students, because we want to make sure that the demand is still there."

Traditionally, Jardine has been home to mostly graduate and international students, but it houses undergraduate students and families as well. With the new apartments, the demographics of the community will change, causing concern to some students. However, Bannister said that these changes are not new.

"I still think there's a lot of misperception about who we are, who we've been, and who we're going to be," Bannister said. "It's an evolving community, and it's an arduous task to communicate to thousands of people a change in how your mission is going to evolve and how they fit

Deborah Kohl, coordinator of community development at Jardine, said at the inception of the project, the Jardine community established community cornerstones to serve as a mission guide for the years to come. These cornerstones - tradition, education, global and imagination - are designed to guide both new and veteran residents to the mission of the community.

'We will continue to hold those cornerstones as the banner of the spirit of Jardine and look forward to helping the influx of people we will meet this fall," Kohl

TO THE POINT Cell phone use in class not needed

School can be stressful for college students, and exams can bring out heart-pounding, palmsweating concentration issues. So focusing on the subject at hand already can be difficult without "Baby Got Back" blaring from a editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Not everyone is the perfect student waiting to soak up any learning that is readily available, but some people are. Not only do ringing phones distract those in the room, but letting your phone ring is plain rude.

Unless you have an extreme circumstance forcing you to leave your ringer or vibrate feature on, put it on silent or turn it off. There are classes that can bore everyone to tears and lead to a quest of alternate stimulation just to stay awake. But having your phone go off in the middle of class not only hurts you - because ultimately your professor will not be happy - but it also hurts those around you.

Most people put their phones on vibrate, but that doesn't always solve the problem. Vibrate features on some models can be as loud as or louder than the actual ringer.

Everyone at one time or another has just forgotten to shut his or her phone off, but there are those out there who must know when someone is calling them at all times. Phones are a great form of communication, but if you can't take a few hours out of your day to go to class, then maybe your priorities are somewhat skewed.

If you are going to have your phone on and it goes off, own up to the ringing. Apologize, silence it and then turn it off. Don't make the professor and students suffer while you look around and pretend it's not you.

So today when you're headed to class, make sure your phone is on silent or turned off. You just might learn something.

Association of video games to violent, misdirected childhood behavior a gross exaggeration

I'm not entirely sure when it was decided that video games are the electronic medium of the devil. Perhaps the tiny white boxes of Pong were moving too fast for someone's comfort. They could have knocked an eye out. Maybe Donkey Kong should have been less aggressive in his princess snatching and barrel throwing. Who knows?

NELSON

Whatever the reason, I'm sure it isn't new to you that video games have long been painted as a waste of time at best, and at worst, a childcorrupting menace. Jack Thompson, a lawyer famous for his battle against video games, has called them "murder simulators" and claims they "teach a kid how to kill efficiently and to love it."

I'm not saying there aren't some things about video games that would give them a menacing air. In the 13 years I've been playing them, I have committed some truly heinous electronic acts. Fellow "Grand Theft Auto" enthusiasts know what I'm talking about. But the key word is "electronic."

We underestimate the youth of our society by imagining they don't know the difference between a real person and a pixel on their television. When I shoot at a zombie, I'm not relating it to the kid in my history class with the glazed expression and drool issues. Even in more realistic games, I am fully aware it isn't real people I'm interacting with, but a series of programs and pictures that form a puzzle or challenge.

Studies have even begun to show that video games improve spatial orientation and problem solving. Those who play video games often are thought to be better equipped for the workplace than those who do not, because they are constantly thrown into contexts in which they have to discover the rules and work around them to solve a problem

So why are so many still opposed to video games?

One reason might simply be that many video game critics be appropriate for every age. This does not make the mature video games evil, just intended for an older age bracket.

I will admit, as a video game addict, I am biased. But I am also more knowledgeable about video games and more aware of their effects on players than the bulk of video game critics.

These are just games, and players know this. I don't think a fairy is going to buzz around my head and obnoxiously point out all the mistakes on my essays. My war-game-addicted brother doesn't fancy himself a sniper. My sister has yet to challenge Zeus for his role as ruler of the gods.

Perhaps critics should reevaluate their stances. We gamers are fully aware these are just games, and if current studies are at all accurate, they might just help us get better jobs than you.

We live in a world where amazing things happen every day, both good and bad. Wars begin and end, important people die, and scandals take place.

Even more amazing than these events is that a vast number of people in this world never hear about them. It's not because the information is not made available - with seemingly endless streams of televised news, radio, and the Internet, no fact is off limits.

No, people are out of touch because they choose to be. An epidemic is growing among people, especially those college aged and younger. Too many people choose not to watch, or in any way digest, the news anymore.

People lead busy lives, and no life seems busier than that of a college student. School, homework, work, not to mention a fabulous social life from Thursday night to the wee hours of Sunday morning - who has time for anything else?

I believe too many of us forget about the world outside of not only our own lives, but our own communities. We flip right by the news channels on cable and go directly to something more "interesting," like MTV or Comedy Central.

This is not to say my own television hasn't seen these less newsy stations, but I've done my best recently to change my ways.

I realized I wasn't getting near the news content I should. My mom would ask me about a major news event that went on in the world in the last week, and I had no idea about what she was talking.

I made it a goal to watch an hour of news a day, not only so I could feel more informed, but so I could carry on intelligent conversations and not feel like someone living in a cave.

I don't always make my goal, but I at least watch a little Fox News while I'm getting ready in the mornings. It's not much, but it gives me a general review of what has happened in the last 24 hours.

Those of my parents' generation live their lives with an understanding of what is happening, and this helps them to make educated decisions. I don't want to be an exception, and I am starting a good habit. I know my own life is not interesting enough to spend all my time absorbed in it.

I think it is sad I spend more hours on Facebook.com than I do figuring out what's happening, and I would bet too many of us do the same thing. How can you expect someone to take you seriously when you have no idea that a major terrorist attack killed hundreds of people across the ocean, or even who is going to run for president?

College is a time for learning new things, and that does not have to be limited to the classroom. On your way to MTV, flip to another three-letter station. I hear CNN is pretty informational.

March on, seniors

By Jacqui Detwiler HE CHRONICLE (DUKE)

DURHAM, N.C. - In the weeks leading up to graduation, seniors who are busy celebrating their accomplishments might feel obligated to display similarly positive attitudes toward the... rest of their lives. In reality, however, ... many students around this time are beleaguered by the perception that becoming fully autonomous adults spells their imminent doom.

For many people, college was less of a choice than an expectation, as were good grades and a respectable major. Particularly for the pathologically university-bound, high school and college degrees have been expected for years. Once a college has been chosen, many students "put their heads down and run," only to emerge four years later with a practical degree and no idea what to do with it.

After graduation, the freedom of the world reveals itself in all its glory. No longer is there a single path to success that ends in a framed degree.

Deciding what sort of job to take and in what city is fraught with uncertainty. Should I follow my significant other? Can I really live in a city where I am afraid to walk home alone at night? Under the circumstances, all the resulting anxiety can suffuse all your pomp and circumstance with entirely too much circumstance and hardly any pomp at all.

I remember before my graduation, I was so terrified of the impending change that I spent a good six months nervously singing this Pepper song about having no friends. Although my dire forebodings didn't wash out, there are a few things I wish I knew then.

It's not where you are but who you're with that really matters.

In the grand scheme, friends are second only to family, and while you're likely to meet more people in your future career, no job is the hotbed of burgeoning social relationships that college is. Keeping in touch with your former best friends is paramount to future happiness, whether you end up right down the street or halfway across the world. Trust me, the more complicated your life gets, the more you're going to want to be able to talk to someone who remembered you when the most important thing in the world was an untapped keg and the cute kid in your economics class.

That said, where you are matters too. If you do not like fast-paced life, you will not like New York. If you donot like hippies and patchouli oil, youwill not like Oregon. And if you do not like to freeze your nuts off, you will not like Wisconsin or Canada.

The means are just as important as

Case in point: when I was an undergraduate, I used to do animal neuroscience and work with these little hamster-looking animals called prairie voles.

One day, I realized that while I loved to consider the results of my research, if one more beastly vole bit my finger through several pairs of gloves, urinated on me and elected to_ leap to its death rather than sit still long enough for me to gently place it in a cage, I was going to lose it. Now I am still a neuroscientist, and I workexclusively with humans. Consider accordingly.

Life is long.

After the discreet periods of high school and college, it's easy to get caught up in the mentality that life comes in little four-year blocks.

One of the most important things I've learned post-college is that after four years of high school and four years of college, there are mind-boggling stretches of time ahead of you during which you can concentrate on one thing or many. It's practically unimaginable all the things you could do and people you could know in this uninterrupted stretch. Thus, drink your champagne, and be not afraid, my senior friends, you have plenty of time Just pick up your head, for Pete's sake-

BAGHDAD - Shiite militants and police enraged by deadly truck bombings went on a shooting rampage against Sunnis in a northwestern Iraqi city Wednesday, killing as many as 70 men executionstyle in the latest eruption of sectarian violence outside the capital.

The gunmen roamed Sunni neighborhoods in Tal Afar through the night, shooting at residents and homes, according to police and a local Sunni politician. Witnesses said relatives of the Shiite victims in the truck bombings broke into Sunni homes and killed the men inside or dragged them out and shot them in the streets.

Gen. Khourshid al-Douski, the Iraqi army commander in charge of the area, said 70 were shot in the back of the head and 40 people were kidnapped. A senior hospital official in Tal Afar, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of security concerns, said 45 men were killed.

HAIFA, Israel - Arab lesbians defied Islamic protesters and a social taboo to gather at a rare public event Wednesday in a northern Israeli city.

Many of the attendees said they were sad that the only place safe enough to hold a conference for gay Arab women was in a Jewish area of Haifa, which has a mixed Arab-Jewish population. Israel's Jewish majority is generally tolerant of homosexuality.

Driven deep underground for the most part, only 10 to 20 Arab lesbians attended the conference, organizers said. Most blended in with Israeli lesbians and heterosexual Arab female supporters without making their presence known.

Outside the conference hall, 20 women protesters in head scarves and long, loose robes held up signs reading, "God, we ask you to guide these lesbians to the true path."

Security was tight, attendance was by invitation only, and reporters were not allowed to take photographs.

POLICE TAKE LEADER OF OPPOSITION FROM PARTY QUARTERS

Zimbabwe HARARE. - Police stormed the main opposition party headquarters Wednesday and arrested its leader shortly before President Robert Mugabe left for an emergency meeting of southern African leaders about the crisis in Zimbabwe.

Morgan Tsvangirai and other Mugabe opponents were taken into custody before the opposition leader planned to talk to reporters about a wave of political violence.

Police sealed off approaches to the Movement for Democratic Change headquarters and fired tear gas to drive away onlookers before taking Tsvangirai and the others away in a bus, said Eliphas Mukonoweshuro, an aide to Tsvangirai.

State radio said Mugabe left for Tanzania to attend a meeting of the Southern African Development Community on the political turmoil in Zimbabwe amid concerns the crisis could threaten stability.

Redevelopment challenges Manhattan's 'small-town' feel

By Ben Hedges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With every passing year, Manhattan grows physically and demographically, thanks to the influx of soldiers from Fort Riley and the increase in students attending K-State.

Many wonder, is Manhattan losing its small-town status to commercial development?

The physical changes are hard to miss with the redevelopment in the downtown area. In the past few years, new plazas have opened, a new and improved Wal-Mart has been built, and most recently, electronics giant Best Buy opened its doors as part of the current redevelopment.

These businesses will stimulate Manhattan's economy, but some residents have complained the community is forgetting the small businesses in Manhattan.

City commission meetings about the redevelopment, especially those involving property acquisition, have drawn dozens of unhappy residents who made passionate appeals to change the course of the project.

The redevelopment forced the relocation of several small downtown businesses including Copies-4-Less, now at 2028 Tuttle Creek Blvd. Owner Rick Reed said he was treated fairly in terms of the compensation he received for being forced to move, but the city holds too much favor for big businesses.

"They're looking out for the big boys and ignoring the little guys," Reed said.

He said he was given adequate compensation, but running the business is more difficult because of the increased rent of his new property.

"The money they allowed me to move was OK," Reed said, "but it will only last me for about six months."

Mayor Bruce Snead said he understood what business owners and community members think about the redevelopment but also said it was the right of large retail chains to come to Manhattan to create a competitive marketplace.

"We have an opportunity to strengthen our downtown core and to help revitalize that core." Snead said, "and to bring retail into an area where it already exists and strengthen our position as a regional center for retail."

Snead said he and other community leaders are working hard to make sure smaller businesses survive and continue to thrive in the Manhattan marketplace.

He said methods such as eminent domain are used only as a last resort and because the city is under a strict deadline to relocate all the businesses for its redevelopment plans.

"I'm sure many businesses don't feel that they've been treated fairly, because they are being forced to do something that they don't want to do,"

Snead said, "and rarely does anyone think that's fair."

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said community members should decide what they want it to be.

"The reason these retail stores are here is because they see many people from Manhattan shopping in their stores in other cities," Butler said.

Butler said he believes Manhattan still holds the qualities of a traditional small town.

"You can still go to the grocery store or a restaurant and see people you know," he said. "People want to have that small town appeal, but also have the large city amenities, and that's why the retail development is important."

Another benefit of the redevelopment will be a better holding power on the hundreds of thousands of visitors Manhattan has each year, Butler said.

"We don't have enough things for them to do," he said. "We anticipate that with the redevelopment, visitors will stay longer and spend more money."

Neither Snead nor Butler said he believes Manhattan is losing its identity. Both cite K-State and nearby communities as contributing to the city.

"I think it's too soon to say that we've abandoned our small businesses," Butler said. "Personally I believe that both big and small businesses can exist in the same marketplace."

Triple disappointment

Wildcats lose despite 31 points from Sweat, triple-double from Lehning

Chris Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Freshman Ashley Sweat drives between a pair of Auburn defenders during K-State's 67-54 win Sunday. Sweat had 31 points during K-State's 89-79 loss to Wyoming Wednesday.

By Staff reports KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If anyone doubted whether the K-State women's basketball team deserved its inclusion in this season's WNIT, those doubts were put to bed with the Wildcats' performance against Wyoming on Wednesday night.

Unfortunately for the Wildcats, it was the Cowgirls who escaped with the 89-79 win in Laramie, Wyo.

K-State overcame a plethora of clock-management issues, scorer's table errors, and a desperate 30-foot, banked-in 3-pointer by Wyoming at the end of regulation to somehow stretch the game to three overtimes.

The Wildcats were charged with 32 fouls on the evening, compared to just 14 for Wyoming. Those fouls translated into a free-throw disparity of 52-18 in favor of the Cowgirls. Additionally, the Wildcats had three players foul out while Wyoming had just one.

"It is such a disappointment, but at the same time it just gives us all hope," assistant coach Kamie Ethridge said in her post-game comments on KMAN-

The loss means the season is over for the Wildcats, but it also is a strong indication that the program is back on Things started off well for K-State, which - courtesy of a pair of baskets from freshman Ashley Sweat - was able to open up a quick 5-0 lead.

The Cowgirls soon woke up, however, and put together an 11-0 run of their own just a few minutes later. By the time junior Kimberly Dietz ended the drought at the 11:28 mark, Wyoming had established a 13-9 lead.

Not to be outdone, the Wildcats immediately embarked on another run of their own and after eight unanswered points found themselves back on top 21-19 with just more than five minutes remaining in the first half.

By halftime, the Cowgirls managed to regain the lead and went to the locker room ahead 26-23.

Both teams came out fired up in the second half, but unfortunately for the Wildcats, their intensity translated into overaggressive defense and numerous fouls. The Cowgirls took advantage and took an eight-point lead six minutes into the half.

Needing quick points, coach Deb Patterson looked to the bench and sent freshman Kari Kincaid into the game. The move proved to be a master stroke when Kincaid netted a pair of 3-pointers near the 12-minute mark. Junior Shana Wheeler's jump shot less than a minute later completed the comeback and knotted the score at 39 each.

The game went back and forth until the overtime periods, when K-State players began fouling out. Wheeler, senior Claire Coggins and senior Naytanda Smith all fouled out, leaving the Wildcats with only six players.

Sweat recorded a career high in points with 31, followed by sophomore Shalee Lehning with 15 and Dietz with 13. Lehning also recorded 12 rebounds and 11 assists on the night for a tripledouble, which was only the fourth triple-double in K-State history.

Wright finished in the Big 12's top 15 in rebounding (6.3 per game, 12th) and defensive rebounds (4.5 per game, 9th), and he helped the Wildcats finish among the conference's top 5 in four defensive team categories.

The team leader in minutes (27.7 per game), Wright saw action in all 35 games for K-State this season with 24 starts. He averaged 6.5 points on 38.2-percent shooting (84-of-220) with 6.3 rebounds, 2.4 assists and 0.9 steals per game. He scored in double figures eight times this season, including a career-high 18 points against No. 6 Texas A&M Jan. 6.

K-State completed the 2006-07 season with a 23-12 overall record and a 10-6 mark in Big 12 Conference play. The 23 wins were the most by a Wildcat squad in nearly 20 seasons, and the 10 league victories were the most in the Big 12 era. The squad was invited to the postseason for the first time since 1999. They advanced to the second round of the National Invitation

FBN | Goodell to begin new disciplinary measures

PHOENIX — NFL commissioner Roger Goodell hopes to hand down disciplinary measures within 10 days of meeting with Tennessee cornerback

Adam "Pacman" Jones and Cincinnati receiver Chris Henry. Goodell's new, stronger playerconduct policy has not been fully formulated, but he still will meet next Tuesday with the two players, who have had numerous run-ins with the law. "These are part of the hearings I've had with a player or coach facing discipline decisions," Goodell said Wednesday as the league meetings concluded. "It's to get their perspective, look them in the eye and get them thinking. They are clearly (designed) to give me better info and more facts. I do it frequently."

It could happen even more often, given the number of off-field incidents that recently have plagued the league.

Jones has talked to police in 10 separate incidents since being drafted in April 2005 and has been arrested five times. On Monday, Las Vegas police recommended prosecutors file a felony charge of coercion and misdemeanor charges of battery and threat against Jones, stemming from a Feb. 19 strip-club fight and shooting.

Henry is among nine Bengals players arrested in less than a year. He had four arrests in 14 months, including marijuana possession, a weapon charge and a drunken-driving count that resulted in a guilty plea to reckless operation of a

BBO | Royals send Bannister, Costa back to minors

SURPRISE, Ariz. — The Kansas City Royals optioned right-hander Brian Bannister on Wednesday to Class AAA Omaha after a rocky spring training.

Bannister, who was obtained in a December trade with the New York Mets for Ambiorix Burgos, was 0-1 with a 10.03 earned run average in four starts. He allowed four home runs, including three in a row, in a start against the Oakland Athletics, and opponents hit .345 against

With Bannister beginning the season in the minors, manager Buddy Bell announced right-hander Brandon Duckworth would be the No. 5 starter. Duckworth was 1-0 with a 4.76 ERA in four spring training games. Duckworth's first start will be April 8 against Detroit.

The Royals also optioned outfielder Shane Costa, who hit .304 in 11 games, to Omaha. In other moves, the Royals sent righthander Kenny Ray to Omaha and reassigned right-handers Jason Standridge and Zach Day, infielders Alex Gonzalez and Fernando Cortez and catcher Paul Phillips to the

New GM gives Royals fans reason to hope

It's fun to make fun of the Royals. I get it. It's hilarious to joke about how bad they are going to be this season. It's funny to reminisce about all the woefully bad losing streaks and bloopers. Why is it so much fun? Because it's It's like making fun of the kid on the playground who just got beat up. It doesn't take any guts to do it.

You really don't need a bunch of fancy stats and numbers to make it clear the Royals haven't been good the past few years. Recently, all it has taken is a quick trip to Kauffman Stadium for an up-close look at how pathetic the team has become.

Believe me, I've made a lot of those trips over the years, and almost all of them left me feeling resentful and angry. I blamed Major League Baseball for the Royals' misfortunes, because it's so tough for small-market teams to compete with rich teams like the Yankees and the Red Sox.

However, in the back of my mind, I always knew it was possible for the have-nots to play with the big boys. The Minnesota Twins and Oakland A's were fighting for division titles every year.

You could argue those franchises had great players, but there was one common thread between those teams: great management. And in baseball, a general manager has a greater effect on his team than in any other sport. That's precisely why there should be so much reason for hope in 2007 for the Royals.

You can talk about players and strategies, but you'll never really know what you have until a few months into the season. The reason I have so much hope this season is because of one man, and his name is Dayton Moore.

Moore, Kansas City's new general manager, is exactly what the city needs to pull it out of its annual summer misery. During his time as assistant general manager for the Atlanta Braves, Baseball America named Moore the top general manager prospect in all of baseball in 2004. He was trained by one of the best in the business, Atlanta GM John Schuerholz, and appeared to be the frontrunner to take over for the Braves when Schuerholz finally called it guits.

All of this, of course, begs the question, "Why the heck would Moore want to come to the Roy-

Well, Moore is a native of Wichita, and there are stories of him driving up for the 1985 World Series just to watch his Royals from across Interstate 70.

But it was something bigger than that, something that slyly tugs inside all of us. Moore wanted a challenge.

So far, it looks like the guy knows what he's doing. He has made a load of moves since taking over last May - mostly by following the Braves' formula and stockpiling young pitchers in the minor-league system. Only time will tell how it will pan out.

Because of some of Moore's moves and the maturing of some younger players who were with the team before he arrived, Royals fans have something they haven't had in years: a realistic reason to hope.

Kansas City is not going to win its division - it doesn't help being in the toughest division in baseball. In fact, the Royals probably won't even be in realistic contention when the pennant race heats up. But they're not going to lose 100 games (or come close), and winning the division shouldn't be the goal right now.

Moore has given the entire organization a plan of action. That was the problem before. No one had a plan anyone was willing to stick with for more than a year.

There is a change of attitude in Kansas City. This still will be a rebuilding year, but the Royals will be as bad as they have been. I'd suggest getting on the bandwagon now before it's too crowded later.

This year's team to yield same results as before

Pitching. It's the most important component to winning, and the Kansas City Royals are the worst pitching team in baseball. In 2006, the Royals finished dead last in five of the six major pitching categories, giving up 967 runs, which was more than anyone else in baseball.

This offseason, the Royals made two major moves to try TRENTON to improve their pitching staff. CLIFTON Kansas City traded one 11game winner, Mark Redman, for another, Gil Meche. Meche is supposed to be the Royals "ace." However, he never has pitched 200 innings in a season and has had an ERA less than four only once back in 2000. To put it into perspective, Meche's numbers are similar to those of the number-five starter for the Milwaukee Brewers, Dave Bush. In fact, Bush had a lower ERA, more strikeouts, and fewer walks, and pitched in more innings last year than Meche, while making a fraction of what Meche is being paid (Meche signed a deal with the Royals for $55 million).

A second acquisition was the often injured and always erratic closer Octavio Dotel, who had an ERA of more than 10 last year. The 33-yearold righty has had only one season in his career of more than 30 saves.

The rest of the Royals' pitching staff is unclear; the Royals No. 2 starter Odalis Perez has had an ERA more than six the past two years and has not won 10 games since 2003. Luke Hudson, Jorge De La Rosa and former prospect Zack Greinke will fill out the rotation - not exactly firm ground to stand on.

Obviously, when free agents are brought into Kansas City, history tells us they have not improved their play; in fact, the opposite usually is true.

Many players were brought in who were supposed to help turn the Royals around - players like Chuck Knoblauch, Juan Gonzalez, Matt Stairs, Darrell May, Terrence Long and Doug Mientkiewicz. There's no reason to believe that guys like catcher Jason LaRue, who hit below .200 last year, and Meche can succeed where so many other players have failed.

The only other key addition will be Alex Gordon. He brings a lot of hype, who has yet to take his first swing > in the big leagues. Though Gordon might be talented, I remember some other talented Royals who did not fulfill the hype, guys like Greinke, Mark Quinn and Angel Berroa. Even the players who lived up to the hype like Carlos Beltran and Jermaine Dye did not help the Royals win games.

The Royals have become the laughingstock of Major League Baseball. For the past 20 years, the Royals have been one of the worst franchises in pro sports. It's going to take a lot more than Meche, LaRue and Gordon to turn it around.

Optimists say new General Manager Dayton Moore will turn the Royals into a competitive team. However, in his first major move as GM, he signed Meche to a major deal. The national media immediately labeled Meche as one of the most overpaid free agents in baseball history. Moore made the Royals a laughingstock ... again.

There is no light at the end of the tunnel. The Royals have the worst pitching staff in baseball, their bullpen is almost nonexistent, they are a terrible defensive team, and they were the only team that didn't have a player hit 20 home runs.

There are question marks at almost every position.

Who will be the starting catcher? Can Mark Teahen play in the outfield? Is Tony Pena Jr. a Major League shortstop? Will Gordon play decent defense at third? When will Mark Grudzielanek be back? Is Ryan Shealy the answer at first base? Will David DeJesus stay healthy? How many games will Mike Sweeney play? Who will be the third outfielder?

The Royals have a fraction of the talent the rest of baseball has. This will lead to exactly what the Royals and their fans have experienced the past 20 years, which is losing.

Broomball a popular alternative to hockey for college students

By Brie Handgraaf KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With Kansas' mild climate, hockey isn't exactly commonplace in the Midwest, but broomball, a newer offshoot, is gaining popularity.

"Pretty much we all show up at the ice-skating rink in City Park wearing tennis shoes, and most bring brooms wrapped up in Duct tape," said Ryan Hamel, senior in biological and agricultural engineering. "Then we basically play hockey, trying to hit the ball into the other person's Hamel is part of a group of students from the Baptist Campus Center that gets together several times a year to play broomball.

"It's a really fun sport, and anyone can play," said Lisa Enns, senior in mechanical engineering. "The best part about playing with the Baptist Campus Center is that it's not competitive at all. We don't even keep score, so if you really suck, nobody cares. We just really like being crazy and having a good time."

However, some people take the sport much more seriously. Broomball.com sells special rubberized brooms from $20 to $100 and ice-gripping shoes from $65 to $80.

This weekend, 42 teams from six states will meet in Blaine, Minn., for the 2007 National Championships. Nick Coblentz, K-State alum, will join the roster of Iowa United for the tournament.

"I think our team should be pretty strong, and we are going to make sure we win," he said. "Nationals are a chance to measure up against others and see how good you really are. We'll be able to see the Men's A teams, which is full check. It should just be a lot of fun to watch."

The Baptist Campus Center group plays more for fun.

"Some people will really surprise you," Enns said. "They will go all out sliding all over the place and diving for the ball. A few people even wear pads and helmets so that they can dive and fall better."

The general laid-back style of the group allows more people to get involved.

"I would say the best part is watching everyone having fun," Hamel said. "Even people who probably wouldn't normally play sports like this and feel comfortable. Everyone seems to look forward to it all year long, because we have a great time."

Members of the Baptist Campus Center play broomball, a game players said is similar to hockey, that uses tennis shoes instead of skates and brooms instead of sticks. The object of the game is for players to hit a ball into the opposing team's goal.

FRITZ | Volleyball coach gets wheelchair-eye view of campus life

what they need."

Fritz and Hawkinson started their tour of campus in the ground floor of the K-State Student Union, making their way upstairs through the elevator on the east side of the building. From there, the two maneuvered their way through the lunchtime crowd in the K-State Student Union Food Court. Right away, Fritz said she noticed a difference.

"People do look at you differently; people are staring," Fritz said. "It would be extremely difficult to have to adapt to being in a wheelchair."

From the Union, Hawkinson led Fritz across campus to Bluemont Hall - what he considers a very wheelchair- and handicap-accessible building.

Along the way, Hawkinson described some of the personal experiences that have come from being disabled.

He explained that on the first day of classes, students are usually a little wary of speaking to him, uncertain of how he will respond. In other words, he said they judge Hawkinson's mental capabilities by simple looking at his physical state.

Hawkinson has taken steps in the past to try and bridge the gap between the disabled and the rest of the world, he said. In several English classes, he has written proposal letters for a disability curriculum to be implemented at K-State, and he said he looks toward the possibility of an organization for disabled K-State students.

"It's really all about familiarization and not thinking of those who look different as being different," Hawkinson said. "It's up to disabled people to be comfortable with themselves,

While Bluemont, in Hawkinson led Fritz through the automatic handicap doors and into a large elevator located just inside the entrance. He demonstrated to her the best way to adjust the wheelchair to fit inside the elevator, and also how to avoid running over other people's feet.

While on the fifth floor, Hawkinson showed Fritz how even something as simple as a door handle can be frustrating for a disabled person.

Because he lost partial usage of his hands in his accident, he said large, round knobs are difficult for Hawkinson to grip and turn. He prefers the lever handles that require only force from the top to open, he said.

After making their way back to the first floor, the two headed toward Leasure Hall. Around campus, Hawkinson was teased by friends for his "speed-demon" ways and told Fritz how he liked to turn his power wheelchair up to the highest speed level when traveling to class.

"It only goes up to 8 miles an hour, but it looks more like 20," Hawkinson said. "Most people get out of the way when they see me coming."

Meghann Wraight, psychology intern for counseling services, also accompanied Fritz and Hawkinson. She helped organize the excursion. Wraight explained that she always has had an interest in disability advocacy and working with others to develop a personal empathy and appreciation for those with handicaps.

"The first step is to raise awareness," Wraight said. "I feel disabilities are fascinating, simply because there are so many unique types. And as you increase your awareness, there is a greater sense of sensitivity. That is the main focus for this

The group then toured Leasure Hall, and Hawkinson showed Fritz the very antiwheelchair elevator on the basement level.

The elevator had a large wooden door with no automatic buttons and an awkward, metal screen that had to be pushed to the side in order to enter. Also, the interior of the elevator was very small, large enough only for one wheelchair.

"That's scary; I don't want to go in there," Fritz said. "That definitely needs to be taken

After leaving Leasure Hall, the group visited Willard Hall using the large two-level cement ramp to enter through the basement. Fritz pointed out that it was easy to get "rugburns" from the manual wheels of her chair, especially braking while going downhill. She also showed signs of fatigue after more than an hour of using only her arms to get around campus.

Willard, Once inside Hawkinson reminisced about a time when neither elevator in the building was working, leaving him stranded on the second floor and late for class. He also talked about the accessibility of K-State's classrooms, saying that it is often difficult to find a comfortable location to sit in the classroom.

"Some buildings don't have ground floor access, so I have to sit at the back of the lecture hall," Hawkinson said. "This makes it really hard to read the screen or what's written on the chalkboard."

Ending at the Union, Fritz and Hawkinson wrapped up their morning.

"I feel enlightened," Pritz said. "This experience has given me a further understanding for those with disablities, especially those in wheelchairs. This has made me appreciate what I have, and I will be much more sympathetic to the needs of and issues of people with handicaps in the future."

Fritz also discussed her admiration for Hawkinson and all he has overcome.

"His attitude and positive outlook on life really impressed me," Fritz said. "I feel honored to have been able to meet Tim. He is truly an incredible young Hawkinson expressed his satisfaction with the experience, saying that Fritz seemed to have learned a lot about the world of the disabled.

"Any exposure helps to open the subject up," Hawkinson said. "Hopefully this gives people something to think about."

Next to the tool table was a demonstration of reading tools for people who have difficulty reading.

"We are here with products for people who are physically unable to read," said Katie Letourneau, assistant at Hale Library and table operator at the event. "Whether or not you need us because you cannot pick up a book or are blind and need Braille books, we can help."

displayed Letourneau different ways that Talking Books, an organization to help people with reading disabilities, helps people read. A large book with Braille print was displayed as well as several different audio players that can be obtained from the library.

There was also information for contacting the Information Technology Assistance Center as well as explanations of the various things on display at the table

In addition to the services and information provided, several demonstrations were set up to illustrate how disabled people live every day, including a poster with examples of what text looks like to a dyslexic person.

"People can succeed and be successful despite the stereotypes that come along with ADHD and disabilities," said Michael Welsch, chapter coordinator of Children and Adults with Attention-Deficit/Hyperactivity Disorder.

CHADD, whose cal chapter was founded by Welsh was represented, along with several other organizations, by displays Wednesday in the Union as part of the K-State for All-Disability Week.

In one area of the courtyard there was a basketball game that required participants to sit in a wheelchair and shoot the ball.

Throughout the room a panel discussion on living with disabilities could be heard. The panel was composed of five students, all of whom faced various challenges due to the disabilities they faced.

The panel began by telling their names and what disabilities they deal with. After they were done, the panel fielded questions and responses from the crowd. Questions ranged from the importance of parental roles growing up to what it was like growing up with a disability.

Dark album disturbingly beautiful

"Pleasure Ground" **** Album review by Mark Sibilla

Dominick Fernow is the twisted mind behind the one-man noisetock band Prurient.

Recorded in one Valentine's Day session, his latest album, "Pleasure Ground," deals with issues of love, lust and life, although in a much more perverse fashion than most musicians.

"Pleasure Ground" consists of four 11-minute tracks of brutal = yet strangely hypnotic - racket.

To call Fernow's music accessible would be misleading, but with some patience and an ear for detail, there is beauty to be found in Fernow's ferocious screams and musical din.

First track "Military Road" opens with a pet-scaring, highpitched electronic screech that lasts 45 seconds before hammering jolts of percussion break into the mix and Fernow adds his distorted shrieks to the clamor.

Whether or not you last past the album's first few minutes will determine how well you will enjoy the remainder of "Pleasure Ground."

Around the halfway point of "Military Road," the track shifts thto a punishing synthesizer assault that sounds like the clatter of the Four Horsemen menacingly bringing the apocalypse.

Fernow echoes the surrounding noise with his shouts of "Will you miss the abuse/The intimate giolence/The parade of bruises/The dadge of punishment?" The Polyphonic Spree this isn't.

"Earthworks/Buried in Secret" consists of extended descending chords that sound like an army of angry mechanized hornets. When Fernow enters with his cryptic lyrits, the track crescendos into a gut-Prenching racket.

However, a beautiful, shimmering synthesizer loop gently floats underneath, giving an interesting counterpoint to the angry music raging above it.

"Outdoorsman/Indestructible" is an oddity, because it is a Prurient Grack that actually requires the listener to turn up the stereo. A distant rumbling and occasional gong hits accompany off-tune piano poodling.

Fernow barely whispers his baiku about burning paper falling to the ground.

The track's subtlety makes it the album's most menacing song, as it keeps the listener on edge, constantly leaving us expecting pandemonium to erupt.

The final track, "Apple Tree Victim," loops distorted chords that are strangely beautiful in their own warped way. If it wasn't for Pernow's grim lyrics equating sexual climax with gory death, the track would be one of the most beautiful ambient songs Brian Eno never created.

"Pleasure Ground" is definitely not music for the weak spirited. Pernow has created a vicious, sadistic album that speaks to the darker side of our humanity. "Pleasure Ground" is perhaps Fernow's best work, and with the proper attitude and an ear for adventure, one can find much to enjoy in this delightfully depraved album.

Men, women favor slimmer, straighter denim cuts

By Austin Apple KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There is no doubt women have more choices when it comes to purchasing jeans. Several stores in Manhattan have styles to fit the different body shapes of both men and women.

Aéropostale carries two styles for men, said Sara Thompson, assistant store manager.

"We pretty much have our boot cut, where we have an original boot cut and a vintage boot cut, and we have straight leg," she said. "(Aéropostale) sells more of the vintage boot cut," Thompson said, "This is because it is tighter fitting in the thighs, which some guys like, because it is a little more fitted."

Men also like the length of the vintage cut since it has a slightly lower rise than the straight leg, she said.

"The vintage cut is the more trendy style of jean that we carry," she said.

The Buckle also carries jeans for hanging out with friends, throwing the football around and playing Nintendo, said Cindy Kulp, district manager for The Buckle.

These are the ones that are a little bit looser and more open in the waist," she said. "They sit down on your waist and are really comfy." Those styles are mon for men, she said.

"It depends on what they are doing," she said. "It seems like we sell a little more of the straighter leg, slimmer boot cut for the going out, weekend gear with the button-up shirt or the fitted T-shirt."

At Hollister Co., men can choose from a low-rise, boot-cut jean and a slim-boot jean, said Leann Armstrong, store manager at Hollister Co.

"Most guys like the low-rise jeans with the zip fly," she said.

Customers are split on which style is more popular, Armstrong said.

"Boomers are going to fit better on a tall and lanky guy," she said, "The Zumas are going to look good on almost anybody."

WOMEN

For women, Aéropostale also carries many jean styles.

"The ones I sell the most are the women's stretch boot cut," Thompson said. "They are a little tighter towards the ankle and the shoe."

A lot of women like them because they can wear flip-flops during the day and heels at night, she said.

"The reason they like the ones with the stretch is because they can buy a smaller size than they usually wear and because they fit a lot more comfortably," Thompson said.

At The Buckle, some women are jeans with a little flare, choosing some are choosing jeans with a more straight leg, and some are choosing skinny jeans, Kulp said.

"Girls are wearing a lot of different fits right now," she said. "Most jeans are low rise, very fitted through the seat, thigh and leg. Most of the varieties seem to be wider down around the ankle width than they are on the top."

Hollister Co. carries the Cali lowrise flare, the Venice low-rise boot and the Laguna skinny, Armstrong said.

"If you are shorter, skinny jeans will not look as good," she said.

Campus disc-golf course offers students new outdoor hobby

By Lacey D. Mackey KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flying discs have grazed the heads of unsuspecting pedestrians on K-State's campus this spring because of one sport: disc golf.

A mix of Frisbee and golf, the game has found its way onto K-State's campus with a marked disc golf course for players and teams.

Adam Ingersoll, junior in biology, said he is a disc golf amateur and started playing in winter 2006.

Though he only has played four or five times, Ingersoll said he likes the sport.

"Number one, it's easy," he said. "If you can throw a disc, you can do it. And it's outdoors, and it's on campus."

Ingersoll said he normally plays with a few friends and enjoys the speed of the game. The course on the K-State campus is fun, Ingersoll said, and takes players through the entire campus.

K-State's disc-golf course is an object course, meaning holes are distinguished by specific items like lampposts, trees or even artwork, said Sara Mueting, president of the K-State Disc Golf Club.

Black crescent symbols or white curved lines on sidewalks or nearby objects mark

"I personally like it," she said. "Some people think object courses are easier than ones with just baskets."

Mueting said another course by Tuttle Creek is more spread out than K-State's course, but walking around campus and seeing people makes K-State's course more fun to play.

Mueting founded K-State's club in summer 2005 with Adam Reichenberger, senior in mathematics and econom-Mueting, senior in biology, said she began playing the sport with friends in her hometown of Salina, Kan.

Mueting said she encourages students interested in playing to come out and try.

"It's not hard," she said. "You just have to throw a Frisbee."

But Reichenberger, the club's self-appointed "Optimus Prime vice president," disagreed about a player's first attempt at playing the high school and continued playing the game after he snatched three discs from the school.

"You'll have a horrible time, but if you stick to it, you'll have a hell of a time." he said. "But those first times suck. If you're competitive, you'll hate it. Make sure you're with people you have fun with."

Reichenberger said he started playing disc golf in ing at you."

"That's how I got into it," he said with a laugh.

Reichenberger said the key to a successful game is plain old luck, but practice also plays a part.

"Practicing a lot, and if nothing's working, try something else," he said.

Though the group has tournaments occasionally, Reichenberger said most students in the club play for

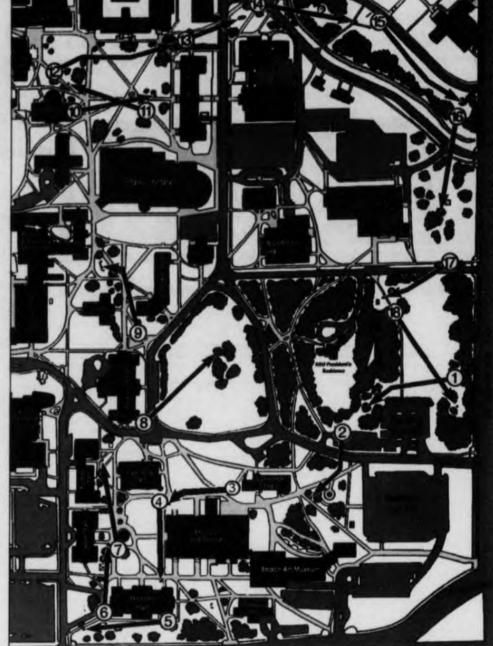

"We're just out there to enjoy the weather," he said.

K-State's official disc-golf course has been used for years, but Reichenberger said students have passed it down over the years, and nobody knows for sure where it came

Participants maneuver around buildings, across streets and through wooded areas on K-State's course, and sometimes players and pedestrians cross paths.

Reichenberger said he has hurt himself, and sometimes others, unintentionally while

General course rules

■ Be cautious and courteous. You are playing on university grounds. Watch out for pedestrians and vehicles.

Parking at the first tee (lot A3) is allowed without a permit on weekdays after 5 p.m. and all day on weekends. ■ Tees are marked in white or with a black crescent symbol. Tees are commonly on sidewalks, but a few tees have their own tee pads.

■ Most of the pins are lampposts. Your disc must hit the upright metal portion of the lamppost at any height. On some holes (1, 8, 12, 15, 16) the pins are trees, and your disc must hit the trunk of the tree at any height. On two holes (9, 13) the pins are statues and have special

■ Water and street penalties: on all holes, any curbed paved areas or creeks are considered out of bounds. Any disc that lands out of bounds is played from the point it last passed in bounds (with allowance for throwing room), and a one-stroke penalty is taken. Discs must be completely surrounded by water or pavement to be considered out of bounds. Discs leaning on curbs or banks

Nonplayable lies: for any disc that lands in such a way that it is determined nonplayable, a one-stroke penalty is taken, and the disc is played from a spot perpendicular to the hazard. There are two notable exceptions: a disc that lands in a tree may be played without penalty from a spot directly beneath the tree; a disc in a flower bed or similar area should be played at a spot outside the area without penalty.

Senate members pass Union budget legislation

By Adrianne DeWeese KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With Student Senate turnover less than one week away, Senate members had more than 10 pieces of legislation in final action at their meeting Thursday night.

Senate members passed a bill increasing the K-State Student Union operations budget privilege fee with a vote of 40-0-7.

According to the legislation, the operations budget increased because of a deficit and a shifting of funds from the Union Program Council/AfterHours privilege fee.

Privilege Fee Committee members voted to increase the operations budget privilege fee 5 percent for fiscal year 2008 and 4 percent each of the following two fiscal years, said Lydia Peele, committee member and junior in education-mathematics.

"I think that our committee spent many hours discussing this as a group and discussing what students are responsible for," Peele said. "We would like to see some more support from other entities on campus as far as money goes."

About 17 percent of the Union's operations budget comes from student privilege fees, which has remained constant for about six years, said Bernard Pitts, K-State Student Union director.

Before the bill's passage, Pitts said the Union's operation budget was behind about 9 percent due to inflation. The Union requested a 9-percent increase for each fiscal year to compensate for inflation.

"It could affect programs, because our facilities are basically the vehicle that operate the programming in a majority of the time," Pitts said of the operation budget deficit.

The Union incurs most of its deficit because of its food services partnership with Chartwells, Peele said.

"We're hoping that this 5-percent increase for students will help bring that closer to zero," Peele said.

Senate members unanimously passed a resolution supporting the 2007 Student Governing Association

Nick Levendofsky, elections commissioner, said the election process went well overall. However, three pieces of legislation were introduced at Thursday's meeting that would change the elections procedure to make it go more smoothly, he said, Senate members will take final action on the legislation at their April 5

Students raise money, awareness for service project in Botswana

By Monica Castro KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Six K-State students soon will pack their belongings for a 10week community service trip to Gaborone, Botswana, this sum-

The team will spend eight weeks doing service work and two weeks sightseeing, said Ana Miller, sophomore in management and international business.

The students sponsored a fundraiser Thursday night at Cold Stone Creamery in Aggieville to raise awareness about their plans and goals for the trip. The trip will cost about $3,000 per student and about $20,000 altogether.

Fifteen percent of the proceeds from Cold Stone will go to Africa, Miller said.

"Right now fund raising is a problem for us since (the trip) is getting closer," Miller said.

This benefit is the first of many help raise money for the cost of the trip and supplies for the people in Africa.

Both teachers and individuals have participated in past community service projects, but this will be the first group composed entirely of students, Miller said.

The group, called International Team Botswana, includes Miller; Shanda Draper, senior in social work; Stefani Schrader, senior in English; Alex Serra, senior in kinesiology; Jessica Simons, junior in family studies and human services; and Nick Timmons, junior in anthropology.

"It is important to us because we are representing K-State in another country," Draper said. "While in Botswana, we are going to participate in projects, but we are going to explore the different options and see what help

The team's projects will help the communities in Africa meet their basic needs.

A few areas in which the students hope to help include working on conservation, volunteering in orphanages and helping instruct teachers how to use computers, Miller said.

K-State graduate Bekki Gabeheart said she thinks Africa needs help in areas like education, health care, agriculture and medical needs because the government is not helpful to the people. She said she supports the group traveling to Botswana.

"I think the support of people st standing there saying that they care is important," she said.

Feed the Need, a concert and benefit on April 5, is another project in which the Botswana group is participating. Feed the Need supports the Changing Tomorrow Children's Foundation, an orphanage care center in South Africa.

The foundation takes care of children suffering from AIDS or other illnesses and provides them

New HPV vaccine saves lives, creates controversy

By Whitney Hodgin KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It involves a physician, a microscope and a pair of sharp metal clippers, all of which target the spread legs of a woman who knows something is wrong.

After positioning the microscope, the doctor collects the biopsy - a small piece of her cervix - and sends it to a lab for testing.

This procedure, a colposcopy, is the only way to detect the human papillomavirus in women who do not exhibit physical symptoms. Every year, 11,000 women will be diagnosed with cervical cancer, and 3,500 will later die from the disease, according to the National Cancer Institute.

Since HPV is the most common sexually transmitted disease in the United States, colposcopies are a painful reality for most health-conscious women at least once in their Recently, however, women have been celebrating a new vaccine, Gardasil, which resists four types of HPV, responsible for about 70 percent of all cervical cancers and 90 percent of all genital warts. It is the first vaccine of its kind and has been approved for females ages 9 to 26.

Similar to the controversy ignited decades ago by the birth control pill, conservatives say administering the Gardasil vaccine to young girls would appear to promote pre-marital sex, while liberals consider it a significant advancement in preventative sexualhealth measures.

Merck, the pharmaceutical company that manufactures Gardasil, has kept its name in the headlines since it released the Food and Drug Administration-approved vaccine last July by urging state-mandated vaccinations for preteen girls.

States are determining their own stances concerning the vaccination,

Comedian Cook will not perform in Manhattan

By Eileen Laux KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to put the Dane Cook rumors to rest.

There was speculation Cook would perform at K-State in April. The Union Program Council vigorously pursued the comedian since October, but because of his "grueling film schedule, he is unable to commit to a performance at K-State," according to the UPC Web site.

On the site, his management states "there is nothing more disheartening than confirming a huge event like this with a respected school like yours, only to have to cancel it because a film's schedule changes."

Ben Hopper, program adviser for the UPC, said the council will not pursue other opportunities.

"It is unfortunate that so many people, including students, have worked extremely hard on this and now it has fallen through," he said.

Student collapses in restroom

By Brett King

A student in the modern language lab collapsed Thursday morning in Eisenhower Hall.

Yih-Wei William Chang, senior in life science and employee in the lab, was taken away by ambulance shortly after 10:50 a.m.

Dixie Lopez, a co-worker, said Chang told her at about 10:30 a.m. that he was not feeling well and asked to lie down in the back of the language lab.

Lopez, senior in psychology, said Yasmin Diaz, Spanish coordinator and instructor, later informed her that Chang was in the bathroom vomiting and had collapsed at least three times and hit his head. Lopez said Diaz called the paramedics shortly after finding Chang in the bathroom.

"He was conscious but was just out of it and kept fainting when they came to pick him up," Lopez said.

Chang was taken to Mercy Regional Hospital for medical attention.

Most students would shudder at the prospect of waking up at 7 a.m. and measuring the temperature and precipitation. But for almost 150 years, student climatologists and professors at K-State have done just that.

"I get regular calls from all over the region and the state," she said. "We give temperatures to the Collegian, (The) Manhattan Mercury, KMAN-1350 (AM) and cover events from all over the university."

President Jon Wefald said Knapp is a important figure at K-State who deserves to be recognized.

"The weather is very important, especially in an agricultural state like Kansas," Wefald said. "It's very deserving that K-State, and Mary, receive this award."

Knapp said it is significant that weather records are taken accurately, especially now issues of global warming and growing climate change are frequently in the news.

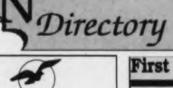

"If you don't keep a history of weather conditions, it's very difficult to predict what it might become in the future," she said.

Along with a long history of weather data, Knapp said the collections also contain several rare weather activities like when lightning struck Anderson Hall and dust storms swept across campus. She said these archives are an interesting and important part of the K-State campus.

"This is one of our best publishers in the state," Newman said. "She has some things that even we are not publishing."

young age.

As our socialization has lurched into the murky realm of cyberspace, we seem to find more about ourselves we don't like. Between online sexual predators, hate-speech chat rooms and cyber-bullies, there seems to be a growing correlation between people jacking in and people who are getting just plain, freaking weird.

The proliferation of cyberdom is moving so fast that entire university studies are formed to keep track. Being a longtime adherent of the cutting edge, I recall in the mid '90s when having an e-mail address earned one a privileged seat at the dweeb banquet – a meal that I, in my early teenage years, consumed with vigor.

As of now, not having an e-mail address is ranked only slightly better than not having electricity. We assume, offhand, that those not listed in Google's database must comprise some sect of Neanderthals — eking out a paltry living in remote corners while plotting against civilized man.

This comes full about in that I, having abandoned my acne and abhorrent social skills for merely being an ugly jerk, now have four e-mail addresses. Yet, even among the most socially affluent I find myself humbled, as people I thought well-mannered and attractive issue forth eight or nine online contacts in one breath.

As a world, we have vaulted past the drudgery of mere e-mail into the world of online social networks, or for the escapist, "massively multi-player online games."

The ability of strangers to locate me based on musical interest is interesting, as is the ability of the average 80-pound weakling to become famed warrior Butch Hips Dragon Whacker. However, the anonymity of the Internet presents unusual challenges for the modern age.

The fact that any of us now are possessed of several virtual identities has created a truckload of opportunities in global networking, but also a set of hardcore concerns never before dreamed. We all enjoy fiddling with an unsecured Facebook.com page — having delighted at transforming friends into a tutued Mr. T married to Kevin Federline, I can attest to this. But, as our virtual identities become more closely meshed with our own, it's not difficult to imagine warning flags on the horizon.

We are inundated with stories of predators posing as children. It does not take much Googling to find that the spirit of racism is alive and flying – that it abounds in the virtual world only heightens the awareness of its prevalence in day-to-day life.

As the virtual world grows in scope we're going to face some important questions as to how we fit into our creation, and even our own identities. Already there are people known more by their online identities than their given name.

Taking into consideration the recent invention of a game controller that operates on thought alone and advancements in neurotechnology that allow stimulation of certain brain regions, the science fiction of a total immersion world might not remain science fiction for long.

State should mandate HPV vaccines for girls to prevent possibility of widespread outbreak

If we could easily prevent several thousand deaths a year, it would seem ridiculous to allow politics to keep us from doing so.

Eleven thousand women will get cervical cancer this year from a human papillomavirus, according to the National Cancer Institute. The disease will kill 3,500 of them.

That figure can be expected to grow in coming years if nothing is done to stop this disease.

We have to face the fact that HPV is a problem and act as a society to solve it. It's just like smallpox, measles, mumps and rubella in that this is a disease that can be defeated through inoculation.

Those who say the price is too high ignore the growing costs of hospital care and the expenses that can be avoided down the road. It will cost us less on our insurance and government-sponsored health care if fewer people wind up on the operating table being treated for cancer.

Also, giving women this vaccine is not immoral. Saving a life through immunity to disease is not a sin, and saying the vaccine will encourage pre-marital sex is ridiculous.

People have plenty of unprotected sex already and have been doing so for as long as there have been people. There are still plenty of dangers to having sex. Giving them this vaccine will not be an act of temptation, but rather one of realism.

Playing politics when people's lives are at stake is not what sensible people do. It is time to put paranoia behind us and start using our heads. We hardly are condemning our children by protecting them.

Risk not reason enough to justify additional government intervention, state taxes

The development of a vaccine to prevent HPV certainly is cause for celebration. This represents a great step toward the prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. However, state governments should not make the vaccine mandatory.

It is acceptable for children to be vaccinated for measles, mumps, tuberculosis, etc., before starting school. All are highly contagious and can be transmitted through coughs and sneezes.

In contrast, HPV can be contracted only through direct contact – spread to or from the genitals, anus, mouth or throat during sexual activities, according to WebMD.com. This isn't exactly a typical risk for the average sixth-grader.

Though we understand people do not purposely contract STDs, they do, most times, choose to participate in unsafe sex.

These vaccinations are not comparable because the other viruses are so easily contracted and dangerous to public health. With the exception of rape victims, those who develop HPV once made a conscious decision to put their sexual health at risk.

Because this is true, it is unfair to mandate a series of three shots, costing a total $405.

Requiring sixth-grade girls to receive an additional vaccine puts financial strain on their parents or guardians, and if they can't afford it, the tax dollars of others are used to cover the cost.

Most women are not at risk for contracting HPV. They choose to make responsible sexual decisions. They and their parents should not be forced to pay for a vaccination they do not need.

Concept of 'sin' causes guilt, not behavior change

I hate the word "sin."

Every time I hear it, I cringe as a mental image of crude behavior and fiery pits of hell pops into my mind. I hate when people tell me I have committed sins. But most of all, I hate when people make judgments based upon their religious guidelines.

"Sin" might be one of the most ambiguous words in the English language. There are so many different interpretations, one could spend a whole day looking over the unceasing list of immoral behavior.

Some people view sin in its original religious context. Others view it as a generalized interpretation of wrong behavior. So is it fair to classify any type of crude behavior as sin when there is no clear consensus?

I understand sin is seen by many as a way to encourage people to behave properly and follow the "ways of the Lord," but I don't completely understand the need for the terminology in this day and age.

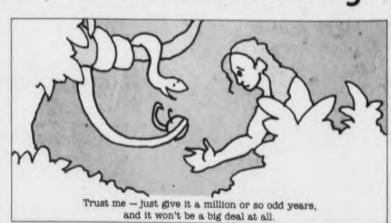

If I remember anything from Sunday school, sins usually are frowned upon by Christians, causing them to pray for forgiveness from God. My problem does not lie with the responsibility of one's actions, but with the broad range of behavior the word has become to signify.

As I mentioned earlier, sins are bountiful. Few people make it through a normal day without sinning in the eyes of many Christians. But it is kind of hard when activities like looking at a woman lustfully or using the combinations of God or Jesus and any type of expression of disgust or anger is a sin.

After examining the true amount of sin one can commit during the day, I eventually developed a headache, and the word meant nothing. I can't even imagine the stress and strain evangelical Christians must face.

I don't think I could make it through a week if I had that type of possible guilt to worry about.

It is great that people have guidelines. But set rules should not hinder what people think about themselves or others. There are laws in this country that do a fairly good job of establishing an orderly populace. The gray areas of law lie within the guidelines set by each family or business.

These are important to maintain a civil society, but are just interpretations of what is right and wrong. Classifying everyone in the same group of guidelines and judging their lifestyles upon this, which some people do, is wrong.

The overhanging guillotine of guilt, known as sin, should not inhibit feeling and thought no longer considered sinful under many circumstances.

What is classified as wrong is in the eye of the beholder, whether it is sin, law or any other form of improper behavior. I have no problem with a person practicing these beliefs, but frowning upon a person with a moral code different from one's own, even if accepted in modern society, is unnecessary.

Maybe no other three-letter word has caused as much of a tinge in the back of peoples' minds as "sin." It is time this archaic intimidation is replaced with a more modern representation of one's actions.

CHILEAN POLICE BATTLE HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS ON DAY OF VIOLENCE

SANTIAGO, Chile – Police on Thursday used tear gas and water cannons to disperse hundreds of rock-throwing high school students who repeatedly blocked traffic on Santiago's main avenue. Officials said 264 people were detained.

Most shops were closed by mid-afternoon, and many offices authorized their employees to leave earlier. Public transportation began to disappear because of a strike by some drivers, and some others feared their buses would be attacked by demonstrators.

The demonstrations came on a date often marked by violence by far-left groups commemorating what they call "The Day of the Young Combatant," which honors two young brothers killed by police in a 1985 protest of the 1973-90 dictatorship of Gen. Augusto Pinochet.

SUICIDE BOMBERS KILL AT LEAST 122, WOUND 150 IN SHIITE MARKETS

BAGHDAD — Five suicide bombers struck Shiite marketplaces in northeast Baghdad and a town north of the capital at nightfall Thursday, killing at least 122 people and wounding more than 150 in one of Iraq's deadliest days in years.

The savage attacks came as a new American ambassador began his first day on the job, and Senate Democrats ignored a veto threat and approved a bill to require President Bush to start withdrawing troops.

At least 178 people were killed or found dead Thursday, which marked the end of the seventh week of the latest U.S.-Iraqi military drive to curtail violence in Baghdad and surrounding regions.

The suicide bombers hit markets in the Shiite town of Khalis and the Shaab neighborhood in Baghdad during the busiest time of the day.

CANADIAN HUNT, GLOBAL WARMING THREATEN LIVES OF SEALS, ACTIVISTS SAY

TORONTO - Canadian officials announced Thursday that hunters can kill 270,000 harp seals this spring, despite environmentalists' protests that thousands of pups have fallen through ice thinned by global warming, jeopardizing the stability of the population.

Animal-rights groups worldwide condemned the hunt as inhumane:

The traditional spring hunt is key to the livelihood of Canadian seal hunters and aboriginal peoples. To protect the seal population in Canada, which now stands at about 5.5 million, fisheries officials announced a reduction in the number that can be killed, down from last year's quota of 335,000 animals.

There was no announcement of the opening date of the hunt.

Geary, Riley counties at risk of AIDS outbreak

Editor,

According to the latest information I have been able to read relative to HIV/AIDS in Riley County, out of 105 counties in Kansas, Riley County has the eighth-highest number of HIV/AIDS cases.

Geary County, which is literally next door, has the seventh-highest number of HIV/AIDS cases. The difference between the counties is just one person.

Because of this, the chance of a very serious outbreak of HIV/AIDS in both Manhattan and Junction City is potentially very high.

All attempts to fight HIV/AIDS anywhere are noble efforts, yet we need to understand the true scope of the disease in this country.

When half of the people who need HIV treatment are not getting it, the chances of a drastic increase in the numbers of individuals becoming infected with HIV/AIDS is almost certain. Certainly 28.7 percent

Wild hogs roam Kansas plains; legislature approves $125,000 budget to help control swine

By Mike Kelly

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though state-approved hunters have shot and killed 257 wild hogs in Kansas in the past three months, experts worry the rowdy razorbacks will continue to cause problems.

Authorities have confirmed the hogs are present in 25 counties, and people have spotted them in 10 more, said Kansas Livestock Commissioner George Teagarden. The Kansas Animal Health Department estimated there are more than 2,000 feral hogs residing in the state, causing temporary headaches to farmers and angst to game regulators.

Feral hogs are accused of stealing crops, ruining wetlands, and disturbing domestic livestock. Additionally, the hogs have no natural predator in Kansas, meaning they can reproduce and flourish with little challenge.

The hogs can eat an acre of crop in less than an afternoon, but some experts are more concerned about the swine's potential to spread diseases that affect both livestock and humans.

According to the KAHD, the diseases of primary concern are trichinosis, leptospirosis, swine brucellosis and pseudo-rabies. In Georgia, diseased feral hogs invaded a domestic hog operation, forcing owners to destroy the entire herd.

"With some of these things, it could go from a feral hog to a domestic herd and then to a number of states almost overnight," said Paul Grosdider, a veterinarian with the KAHD.

Feral hogs also could spread hoof and mouth disease, which experts say could have disastrous affects on the state's economy. Though many sportsmen would enjoy hunting the drove, Kansas authorities banned the hunting of feral swine in 2006. House Bill 2899 made it illegal to engage in, sponsor or assist the killing of feral swine for the purpose of sport.

Teagarden said the main reason Kansas has a problem with wild hogs is because domestic hogs have been released by those who favor hog hunting. The domestic hogs quickly became wild and rapidly produced offspring that were born in the wild. Legalizing hog hunting may entice further hog release.

"We know they didn't walk from southern Kansas to the Oklahoma border," Teagarden said. "They don't move that far. Someone picked them up and moved them."

To control the swine, the Kansas legislature approved a $125,000 budget. A USDA helicopter and gunmen conducted aerial assaults on the hogs, but with inconsistent success.

Last year, an aerial raid near the Cimmarron River eliminated 73 feral hogs. The same effort this year took down just two.

Many hunters suggest putting a bounty on the hogs would quell the population, but U.S. Department of Agriculture wildlife biologist Chad Richardson said a bounty might only reinforce releasing domestic hogs into the wild. Because pigs also are domesticated in Kansas, it would be nearly impossible to prove where a pig was killed and whether it was truly feral, he said

"As hunters, we think that we control any kind of wildlife population by hunting it," Richardson said. "The hog is a different kind of critter altogether. Trying to get that across to hunters is a challenge."

Mendez mentors tennis team, continues education at KSU

K-State women's tennis assistant coach Marcos Mendez motivates his players and provides them with an extra competition during practice. He came to K-State to earn his graduate degree in marriage and family studies after he was an academic All-American at Martin Methodist College in Pulaski, Tenn.

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When returning from injury, athletes usually credit their doctors and physical therapists. However, one assistant coach at K-State received credit for helping one of his athletes come back from injury.

Junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia credited K-State women's tennis assistant coach Marcos Mendez, a graduate student in marriage and family studies, with her quick recovery from injury. Kvaratskhelia, who was sidelined with an undisclosed injury in late February, came back and won against Tulsa March 10. She overcame a first-set loss and won the subsequent two sets to overtake her opponent.

"I'm really thankful to my assistant coach, because he was a great supporter and motivator," Kvaratskhelia was quoted as saying in an article in the March 12 Collegian. "I want to thank him a lot for motivation and how he was there for me. It's not the reason why I won, but it helped me. I lost the first set, and it was hard to come back, but he was a great support."

She later showed him the article.

"Tamar sent me a message saying that I needed to read the Collegian," Mendez said. "When I read it, I loved it. My hope is that I am a motivator of the group and that they feel comfortable and play better when they know that I am around."

Mendez and K-State (2-9, 0-2 Big 12 Conference) will travel to play against Oklahoma (5-9, 2-3 Big 12) Saturday and No. 52 Oklahoma State (10-5, 3-2 Big 12) Sunday.

Mendez has been an assistant coach to head coach Steve Bietau for two years while completing his master's degree. On the sideline, Mendez is a motivator, coach and fellow tennis player.

"Marcos may have the toughest job on the team of anybody," Bietau said. "As you can see, he's a hitting partner, he's on the court every day with them, he's in the office every day with me, analyzing and planning things, trying to figure out where our next move is going to be. He's also going to school at the same time. It's a demanding job."

The day-to-day aspects of the job include planning practices with Bietau and giving input on team and individual performances.

"The assistant coach assists the head coach in almost everything," Mendez said. "(Bietau) plans practice and asks for my input, how I see things sometimes so he can get another perspective. He ultimately makes the final decision on what we do.

"When we go to matches, I help him, because he gets two of the doubles pairings and I get the other, and we split the singles matches at three apiece. I just try to help the team out."

Mendez came to K-State from Martin Methodist College, Pulaski, Tenn., where he was an academic All-American in 2004. He said he chose K-State because of the tennis team.

"I was looking for an assistantship position, and I was on the NCAA Web site and found an ad looking for an assistant coach," he said. "It brought me here, and I loved it. I saw the coach practice for 10 to 15 minutes and I knew they had a great level of talent, and the organization of practice was very fine-tuned. I knew this was a great place to be."

BBC Young, Mountaineers win first NIT title in 65 years

NEW YORK — Frank Young and Wee: Virginia shot past Clemson to its first NIT title in 65 years.

Young scored 24 points, including six 3pointers, and De'Sean Butler added 20 points to help West Virginia beat Clemson 78-73 in the NIT championship Thursday night. Young was named the NIT's most outstanding player. Young averaged more than 20 points in the Big East tournament. The senior followed that up with a stellar NIT to cap off his college career, averaging 22.3 points in five games.

The win was the Mountaineers' first NIT title since 1942 when Rudy Baric led West Virginia over Western Kentucky.

West Virginia (27-9) had advanced to the championship game by edging Mississippi State 63-62 on Darris Nichols' buzzer-beating 3pointer. Nichols finished with 13 points and nine assists in the championship game

The Mountaineers, who came from 14 down in the second half in the semifinal, didn't need a late-game rally this time, using a 12-2 to run at the end of the first half to take control of the game. The Tigers (25-11) trailed by double digits for the entire second half.

K.C. Rivers scored 18 points and Vernon Hamilton added 16 for Clemson, which completed one of the most up-and-down seasons in school history. The Tigers started out 17-0 before losing nine of their next 11 games. They turned things around in late February winning five of six before falling to Florida State in the first round of the Atlantic Coast Conference tournament Clemson finished tied with the 1986-87 team led by Horace Grant — for most victories in school history. The Tigers were trying to become the third straight team from South Carolina to win the NIT. The University of South Carolina had won the last two titles.

K-State (18-7, 1-2 Big 12 Conference) is coming off an 8-3 loss to in-state rival Wichita State Tuesday night.

Ramos will face Hutt, who has a 2.45 ERA, which is sixth-best in the Big 12. Hutt has a 5-1 record and is coming off an outing in which he gave up three runs in four innings in a 10-3 loss to Texas.

Some offensive standouts for Tech are freshman Chris Hall and sophomore Roger Kieschnick.

Hall is batting .351 in 97 at-bats and has started 26 games for the Red Raiders. Kieschnick has gone to the plate 124 times and earned a .347 average. He has started all 29 games.

Small sports deserve equal attention from K-State fans

This semester, I have been blessed to be able to cover the K-State track and field team because of the quality people involved. It seems these types of people. For instance, while I was doing an interview Wednesday, I was surprised by an answer I got from three high smaller sports have tons of jumpers I talked to The question was, "What WITT are you doing after your career at K-State?" Senior Kyle Lancaster, who could jump over 7-foot-3 freshman center Jason Bennett, began to answer about how he was going to compete at the 2008 Olympics in China (yeah, we have Olympians at K-State), and by the end he said, "I am going to do it as long as it is fun." Senior Kaylene Wagner and sophomore Scott Sellers agreed as they laughed with huge smiles on their faces.

It sounds cliché, but it was refreshing. They meant it. They really like what they are doing. It is not about > money, like the big entertainment sports, but about using and enjoying their talents. Track is not a flashy sport.

You don't see it on television. The NCAA Indoor Championships could be viewed only on the Internet. It is a sport that is overlooked nationwide, let alone in Manhattan.

But track isn't the only sport at K-State that is overlooked. We have cross country, equestrian, men's and women's golf, rowing and women's tennis. All these athletes represent our university through hard work and love for what they do.

I have been here for four years, and I feel a little guilty that I have not supported these groups more. I call myself a K-State fan, but am I really? I am starting to think not.

Fans should appreciate everyone who sweats for our university. Not only that, we should respect them for doing what most of us cannot accomplish. In equestrian, athletes ride a horse and have it jump over obstacles. I respect this talent because I can barely stop a horse from trotting. I can play golf and tennis - but not well. It fascinates me when I see tennis players hit shots with insane spin or try to outwit their opponents on the court.

But I can relate to these athletes somewhat, because in high school I ran cross country and track. I was OK, but I felt shunned by the rest of the athletes at my school. My peers and I could do things normal people or even better-than-average athletes could not, like run 5 miles with ease. I felt people were somewhat bitter about this.

Maybe most people don't like these sports or talents because they can't do them. Everyone can go out and play football or basketball, so people can relate to those sports better.

Still, that is no reason to disregard less popular sports.

If you say these sports don't provide winners and that is why you don't like them, I beg to differ. They are some of the most successful teams on campus.

The equestrian team has nine national titles. The last national championship track won was last year when Christian Smith won in the indoor mile with a time of 4:12.75.

If you find people who participates in these sports, ask them about it and you might appreciate them. If you do, by all means, tell them. I know I would like to thank them for their efforts here at K-State, even though they never seem to have the spotlight.

Love of music keeps student playing, working to perfect craft

Q: How did you get into playing the guitar?

A: Well, my dad had a guitar that he got when he graduated from college. I heard "Riders on the Storm" by the Doors ...

I was listening and thought, "I can do that." So I picked up the guitar, looked on the Internet, and after that, looked up "Free Fallin" by Tom Petty. I just kept doing that again and again. I don't know what I would have done without the Internet. Tabs online is how I first taught myself. I didn't take lessons until a little bit later.

Q: How did your first band come about?

A: About the same time I started playing guitar, one of my friends, Chris, was starting to play. After we had both learned a little bit, Chris started to write songs, and my friend Josh started to play with us. Mainly we had nothing better to do - it was Topeka. We called ourselves the Robert. L. Super Band.

Q: How is jamming with friends in the mean time?

A: Yeah, it's fun to go jam, but I'm the kind of person who likes to sit down and work on music and make good music. I like to have fun, but it's a lot more rewarding when it sounds good.

Q: Who were your musical influences starting out?

A: The Doors, definitely. I loved them when I started, and then basically classic rock from there. That was also right when I got into Dave Matthews. I really started listening to music religiously when I started to play guitar.

Q: If I heard you play, who would I think I was hearing? A: Real recently when I play electric, especially with effects, people say that I sound like Sound Tribe Sector Nine. Especially on the electric, I like the real melodic stuff, like what Trey Anastasio and the stuff that "moe" does with the think it's the most versatile guitar. I like how the melody is very apparent and isn't happenstance. It's going somewhere - it's got a story.

O: What is it about the guitar that you really enjoy?

A: Number one, it's the iconic rock-'n'-roll instrument, of course. Number two, I just instrument, especially with the electric. You can get a wide range of volumes and sounds with very little effort. You can play two tones at once, hitons, pull-offs, things like that.

Q: In the future, what do you want the guitar to be for A: Well, if I had my wish, I'd be a rock star ... it would be my dream to play music and tour for a living. Right now that doesn't seem plausible, so I would just like to find a good band where the musicians are good, and I like to play with them, where the music is good and we play for people who

MAC's BirdHouse Acoustic Series brings back songwriter, activist

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A performer who has sung at the Manhattan Arts Center twice previously will return to sing again tonight. Carrie Newcomer, a singer/ songwriter from Elkhart, Ind., has released 10 solo albums dating back to 1991, according to her Web site. She also is considered by many as an activist. She plans to donate a portion of the proceeds from her most recent album, "Regulars and Refugees," to Second Harvest, an organization that works to combat poverty and hunger in the United States

Newcomer also is active in organizations like Planned Parenthood, Nature Conservancy, Literacy Volunteers of America and Habitat for Humanity, said Robby Bear, booking agent for the BirdHouse Acoustic Series and instructor of biology.

"She doesn't just do singing and song writing, but she's also an activist," he said. "She's also been in the business for quite some time. She's really a fantastic singer/songwriter."

Several of her pieces reflect her activism, Bear said.

"She is interested in all of these organizations, and her music reflects that," he said. "She takes stories about individuals and puts them together to make a larger community story. Most of her songs revolve around activism. She also sings songs about people losing loved ones."

BirdHouse Acoustic Series performers usually combine elements of jazz, blues, folk and country, according to the Manhattan Arts Center Web site.

Purvis said she would describe Newcomer as an "absolute crowd favorite."

"Her songs are based on human nature," she said. "The crowd will recognize themselves in half of the songs in good ways and in honest ways that they'll never admit out loud. Once you

Technology at SpringDance to give program New York flair

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SpringDance, a full-length recital featuring choreography by K-State dance faculty, students and a guest artist will take place at 8 p.m. Saturday and Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

The annual event, organized by the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance, will have several new features this year.

Of the 11 dances, 10 will feature live music performed by various members of K-State's faculty and student body.

Erin Kolarik, senior in mass communications, will be dancing in her third Spring-Dance. She said the preparation that goes into the show with live music is very different in than a show where the music is pre-recorded.

"I am playing percussion on three pieces and designing lights for one piece," he said. "I have also composed music for two pieces of the show, a solo, which I play, and a piece for the KSU percussion ensemble."

Dunn said the advancement of technology also has created more options and opportunities to provide a different show.

Allan Molnar, a professional pianist who lives in New York City, will perform for the show via the Internet. Video of Molnar playing will be projected onto a large screen, and two musicians and three tap dancers will perform on the stage.

Act aims to send more students abroad

By Jessica Sabbah NORTHERN STAR (NORTHERN ILLINOIS UNIVERSITY)

DEKALB, Ill. - A new bill might make some students' dreams of studying abroad a reality.

The Paul Simon Study Abroad Foundation Act of 2007 was introduced March 12 to the House of Representatives by Tom Lantos, D-Calif., and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla. The act seeks to allow students to study abroad.

Ultimately, the desired outcome is to have one million students participating in study abroad programs annually.

"It's a great opportunity for people like me, who've always thought about studying abroad, to actually experience it," said Joshua Cossey, freshman in art. "This bill is a good thing."

Northern Illinois University president John Peters, who in the past has advocated an increase in the number of students able to study abroad at NIU and around the globe, also expressed his enthusiasm for the bill

"I'm pleased to support this legislation," Peters said.

"It would greatly increase the number of opportunities for American students to study abroad."

The benefits of the studyabroad program include a deeper understanding of different cultures and the chance to acquire global workplace skills, among many other aspects, Peters said.

Changes already have been made to NIU's Study Abroad Office in an effort to increase the number of students participating in the program, including the addition of more outreach programs like the annual Study Abroad Fair.

About 300 students study abroad through NIU each year, according to the Study Abroad Office. Cost varies with factors including length of program, location of travel and whether the students stay in one location or travels to various points during their time away.

"We're very enthusiastic about it in the Study Abroad Office," said office director Anne Seitzinger. "This is a huge opportunity for students across the U.S., especially NIU students."

Pennsylvania college one of many schools using only macintosh

By Albert Sun DAILY PENNSYLVANIAN (UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA)

PHILADELPHIA - At Wilkes University, it's more like, "Dude, you're getting a Mac."

Last month, the Pennsylvania college announced its plan to switch all 1,700 of its computers to Intel-based Macs, the latest indicator of a resurgence of Macs on college campuses.

Wilkes spokesperson Christine Seitzinger said the ability of Macs to run both the Windows XP operating system and Apple's OS X allowed the university to make the switch.

Because Macs now can run all the necessary programs that require Windows, the switch was simply a matter of choosing higher-quality hardware, and a desire to be hip, Seitzinger said.

"This generation of students has an affinity for Apple products," Seitzinger said, pointing out the popularity of the iPod.

Seitzinger said every three years Wilkes University has an "aggressive technology refresh" in which all computers are replaced.

In this most recent cycle, Apple's bid simply beat the other providers', she said.

The move by Wilkes is perhaps part of a larger trend of Macs growing in popularity among college students.

Last fall, Macs tripled in sales at Princeton University, and Harvard University reported a 30-percent sales increase. At Penn, however, there are no plans to make a similar switch, said SAS Information Technology Director Ira Winston

The decisions of Mac versus PC are made at the level of individual faculty, departments and schools.

Each faculty member has the choice of either a Mac or PC laptop or desktop, Winston said.

For computer labs, the decision is made by each individual school, depending on the lab's purpose. As for labs run by SAS, Winston said that, for media-oriented computer labs, Macs typically would be used, and PCs would be chosen for more general purposes.

"The machines satisfy different needs for different people," Winston said. "We don't want to be so prescriptive that we limit it to one."

Freshman Sarah Feldman, who owns a MacBook Pro, said she doesn't think switching the entire campus to Macs would be a good idea.

"More than half the people (at Penn) use PCs – getting rid of all (the PCs), there would kind of be an uproar about it," Feldman said.

Junior Graeme Brown, also a Mac user, echoed this sentiment, saying for the sort of things students typically do in a computer lab — like word processing and checking e-mail — it doesn't really matter whether the computer is a Mac or a PC.

"There's not a whole lot of difference," he said.

Admissions standards for student athletes under discussion

By Michael Harris DAILY O'COLLEGIAN (OKLAHOMA STATE UNIVERSITY)

STILLWATER, Okla. – This year, 38, or 11.2 percent, of Oklahoma State University's 337 alternative-admissions students were student athletes, according to university-provided data.

The percentage exceeds the university's unwritten guidelines for admitting athletes who do not meet the academic standards required of most students.

A rule established by the Oklahoma State Board of Regents for Higher Education dictates the number of alternative-admissions students a statefunded university enrolls cannot exceed eight percent of the previous year's freshman class, said Martha McMillian, alternative admissions coordinator.

Of that eight percent, guidelines established by OSU's Office of Undergraduate Admissions and the Office of Academic Affairs said student athletes could include about nine percent of all alternative admissions students. "The nine-percent rule was never a written policy," said Albert Colom, vice president of enrollment management and marketing. "Rather, it was established as a guideline. The number can breathe up and down, and it just seemed like an appropriate number at the time."

OSU's guideline regarding student athletes never was adopted as a written policy because the State Board of Regents has no stipulation for the number of athletes a university can enroll, said Bill Ivy, assistant vice president of enrollment management and marketing.

"OSU wasn't compelled to adopt any kind of policy," Ivy said. "But, it worked out with the faculty and the administration."

No NCAA policy limits the number of alternative-admissions student athletes a university can enroll, but such a cap has been a key topic in recent NCAA discussions.

An NCAA task force noted in 2005 that setting limits on alternative admissions would ensure universities would not gain an unfair advantage by admitting a greater number of lesser academically qualified athletes than other schools.

The task force also was concerned with the inconsistencies some schools exhibited regarding the proportion of alternative admissions athletes they accepted because some universities seem willing to compromise their admissions standards for talented athletic recruits.

Of concern to the NCAA and Knight Committee is that the trend is not limited to OSU.

With an increasing emphasis on fielding championship-caliber teams, universities across the nation are using alternative means of enrolling top athletes with the hope of generating more victories, and consequently, more money for the school.

The economic benefits are so great that some universities appear willing to exploit both their own policies and their student athletes — many of whom are not likely to graduate.

OSU must act follow the eight-percent limit established by the Board of Regents. The university has the right to adjust how many student athletes it allows through alternative admissions, Colom said.

Such practice gives credence to the NCAA's argument that schools often are allowed to make arbitrary and unregulated decisions during the enrollment process — particularly for student athletes.

Alternative admissions standards were a key topic at a Jan. 22 meeting of the Knight Commission, which serves as an advisory board to the NCAA, in Washington D.C. There, Joe Castiglione, athletic director at the University of Oklahoma, told the commission alternative admissions are a reality in college athletics.

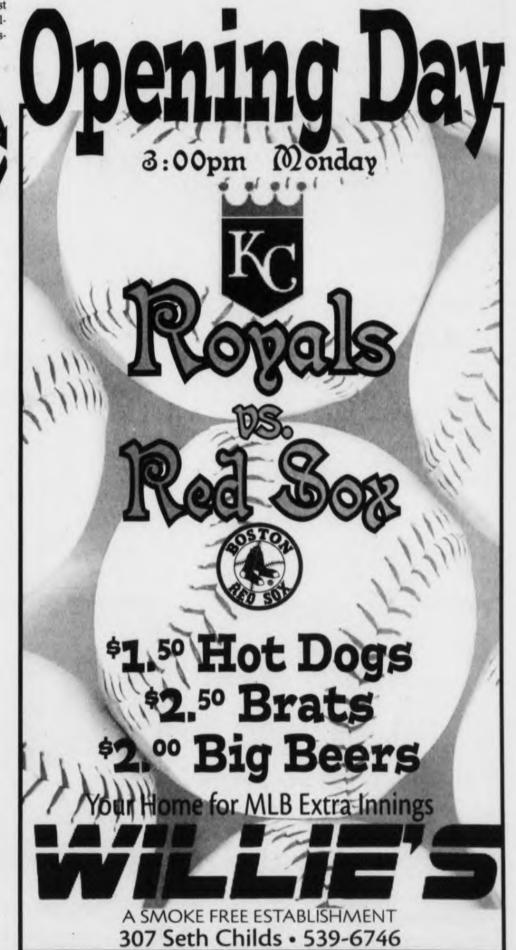

"You cannot compete if you are the only ones not to have special admits," Castiglione said. "It's nothing to run from or make fun of. It's just true."

Transcripts of his presentation show Castiglione told the commission that 25 percent of OU's student-athletes struggle with their classes – particularly members of the Sooners' football and men's basketball the vaccine to be opt-in, rather than the current optout policy that allows parents to refuse immunization for their children with a written statement.

A bill that would require vaccinations for sixth-grade girls failed in the Kansas Legislature last month. Lawmakers told the Kansas City Star mandating vaccinations would infringe on parental rights and was too new and controversial.

Manhattan resident Jody Redding, who has an 18year-old daughter, said Gardasil should not be mandatory for school children.

"I think it should be the parent's decision if the child is under age," Redding said. "It's their child, and the government shouldn't have the 'its moral controversy. right to make a private family decision like that."

Opponents of mandatory vaccinations also cite the high cost and unknown long-term health effects as reasons for their reluctance. The three-shot series is available for $405 at K-State's Lafene Health Center and is not covered by all insurance providers.

States like Massachusetts are considering administering the vaccine for free, since less money ultimately would be spent because of increased health and lower future hospital bills.

Supporters of the vaccine feel the number of lives Gardasil could save - Merck claims the number of cervical cancer victims will drop by two-thirds - outweighs

"This is definitely a step in the right direction," said Erica Starns, sophomore in family studies and human services. "Sometimes it seems like they want to scare us out of having sex since there isn't 100-percent protection against every STD we could possibly get. But we should be able to feel safe, whether we have sex or

Starns said she plans to get the vaccine this semes-

"The benefits of getting this vaccine are tremendous," said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion at Lafene. "What it protects against is very effective."

Information boards and brochures have sprung up all over Lafene, trying to catch the attention of K-State students who might or might not know they are part of the demographic most at risk for contracting HPV.

"Of the approximately 6 million new cases of HPV in the United States every year, it is estimated that 74 percent of them occur in 15to 24-year-olds," reads one Men cannot receive the vaccine yet, but Kennedy said she hopes once Gardasil is approved for men, they will get vaccinated.

"I didn't know about the vaccine until a couple of months ago," said John Caton, senior in psychology, anthropology and criminology. "I'm definitely going to get it when I can. It would be stupid not to take advantage of something like that."

SENATE | Members discuss election procedures, rec additions

"We have a very good set of regulations here tonight, and we're mainly making some changes for the future so down the road we won't have any problems," said Levendofsky, senior in agricultural communications and journalism.

Senate members passed a bill to amend the Student Senate Special Committee to Study Long-Term Strategies for the Peters Recreation Complex.

In early March, K-State sent students an e-mail survey regarding possible additions to the rec and student privilege fee increases. More than 3,000 students responded to the survey.

Because the student survey results were presented to the committee on March 9, committee members will presentthe final proposal to the student body president and the Student Senate chair by April 20, according to the legislation. The committee also will present the proposal to Student Senate and university administration members after April 20.

"The 2007-08 Student Senate will be able to look at the results and decide what to do with the complex," said Ashley Boldt, Student Senate chair and senior in family studies and human services.

April 5 will be the last Student Senate meeting for the 2006-07 term. Senate turnover will take place after the meeting, and the first Senate meeting for the 2007-08 term will take place.

'SNL' star Poehler shares thoughts on upcoming film

By Eric Davis

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amy Poehler stars in the upcoming movie "Blades of Glory" alongside Jon Heder and Will Ferrell.

In the film, Poehler plays part of a champion brother-sister figure skating pair, along with partner Stranz, played by her real-life husband, Will Arnett. Ferrell and Heder play former rivals who skate in pairs competition thanks to a loophole in the rules.

Poehler answered questions by teleconference about her upcoming movie and which former Olympic skater she most resembles.

Q: What was it like to work with your husband?

A: It was really fun. It was nice to have someone that I could rehearse with. There is a lot of ice skating choreography, and we would practice a lot. We performed the moves while walking our dogs, watching "Lost." You know, everywhere.

Q: Will you ever star on "30 Rock" and act with Tina Fey?

Emizet Kisangani, associate professor of political science, researches effects of military intervention in Africa, He and his colleague, Jeff Pickering, associate professor of political science are using their research to look for ways to fix the political, social and economic problems in Africa.

Professors work to understand, help solve civil war issues in Africa

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Emizet Kisangani and Jeff Pickering, associate professors in the Department of Political Science, are searching to find an resolution to an issue some people consider unsolvable: how to fix the problems in Africa.

However, what they are looking at is bigger than just Africa – it is worldwide.

Pickering and Kisangani research the effects of international military intervention, and Kisangani works solo to see how military intervention can affect the process, outcome and results of civil wars.

Military intervention is when one government intervenes in the politics of another country, Kisangani said, whether it be through humanitarian aid or sending in troops.

Kisangani said leaders often use military intervention to deal with domestic issues, citing the United States as an example.

"If we face inflation in our country, if (the president's) approval rating goes down. To revive it, what they do is to send the troops abroad, so this way they can get support, and then people forget about the economy."

The effects of military intervention can be good or bad, or can change nothing.

"Sometimes (interventions) can democratize a society," Kisangani said. "Sometimes they will create problems like what we have in Iraq today."

One aspect of Kisangani's solo research involves military intervention during civil war. He is working to understand what makes a civil war happen and what causes it to last.

The causes of civil wars are divided into two broad categories: greed and grievance, he said.

"It really simplifies the complexity of civil wars, which I don't like," Kisangani said.

He broke the causes down further and divided them into more specific categories of political, economical, social and psychological issues.

"If we know the causes, and we know the causes that keep them going, it is possible to prevent them," he said.

In ongoing civil wars, Kisangani said it is possible for an outside government to come in and tip the balance. He said he also is trying to find an answer for how to keep countries from regressing into a civil war.

"When you have some type of peace, how do you rebuild those societies to avoid another civil war?" he asked.

The private sector is key to reconstructing a post-civil war country, he said. It is important for private businesses to invest in war-torn societies.

For example, investing in natural resources, like reopening oil fields or mines, would create employment opportunities and increase the economy.

In 2005, Pickering and Kisangani received a grant from the National Science Foundation to continue their work collecting data to explain the political, economical and social effects of military intervention on a target state.

They have published their research in two top political science journals, International Studies Quarterly and Political Research Quarterly.

Kisangani said the duo's goal is to eventually have its ideas applied. He said most politics come from something a scientist wrote.

"If you have a great idea, you feel like it will help humanity, and if someone can apply that, I think that is great, and that is what we are striving for," Kisangani said.

Kisangani was born in the Democratic Republic of Congo. He received two master's degrees in economics and political science from the University of Oregon and received his doctoratal degree in political science from the University of Iowa.

He moved to Manhattan in 1994 to teach and raise a family. He also is the director of the African Studies Center at K-State, which received the K-State Targeted Excellence award.

Students share stories, tips for finding quality summer internships

By Katelynn Hasler KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The search for a summer internship has come to an end for some K-State students, while others continue to seek out the right fit.

Two students shared their experiences in the search for an internship.

Nick Caton, fifth-year senior in architectural engineering, found a position as a draftsman at Orazem & Scalora Engineering, a Manhattan engineering firm. He will be working under people in a position similar to one he intends to pursue for his own career, he said. He has worked as an intern for the firm for about a year and will continue to work there through the summer.

Evan Helmbrecht, junior in hotel and restaurant management, will work in the front office of a downtown Seattle Marriott Hotel. This will be Helmbrecht's second internship, which he said he pursued in the hope that more experience would lead him to a management position after graduation.

The two students attributed their successes in finding internships to different things.

For Helmbrecht, connections were important. A friend's father, who also works for Marriott, was able to give him valuable connections within the company, he said. "Who you know is possibly the biggest thing in finding an internship or job," Helmbrecht said. "To network and find contacts is really important."

Cold calls landed Caton his internship. Caton said he spent quite a bit of time mailing letters and résumés to potential employers, but he eventually picked up the phone book and began making cold phone calls to companies around the country.

"The first few were pretty nerve-wracking," he said. "But the experience of getting comfortable with that was a very good one."

Caton said his phone calls led to many job offers.

"In general, I think employers are very impressed with that kind of initiative," he said. "While some calls might be disappointing, they can be very successful as well."

For students who still are searching for an internship for this summer, it is not too late, said Dottie Evans, assistant director of career and employment services.

"Not all is lost yet, by any means," she said. "There are still a considerable number of positions out there that can be dug up."

K-State's internship and job database offered by CES still has many positions available, she said, which can be accessed when students activate their free accounts.

This can be done at www.

ksu.edu/ces by following the Wildcat Works eRecruiting link.

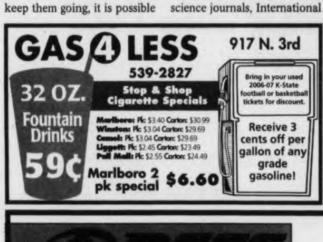

For those seeking an in-

For those seeking an internship next year, the services offered by CES in the fall can be invaluable to a student looking for a summer internship, Evans said.

"If students position them-

"If students position themselves to be involved in the things that we have happening early here on campus, they have a much, much better shot at landing the internship they want," she said.

It is time for new, influential leaders to take command of student publications.

Professor pleads 'no contest'

By Eric Brown
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State professor John Uhlarik pleaded no contest Friday to one count of felony stalking.

Uhlarik, a suspended K-State psychology professor who was accused of harassing former K-State track athlete Gwen Wentland, waived his right to a trial and pleaded to one count of a stalking incident, according to an article in the Manhattan Mercury.

According to court records, the stalking incidents began after Uhlarik and Wentland ended a relationship in 2000. Wentland, a 1995 K-State graduate, was granted a final protection from abuse order against Uhlarik on March 14, 2001. However, Uhlarik was arrested on May 5, 2004, on charges of stalking Wentland, according to a May 7, 2004, article in the Collegian.

Three days later, the Collegian reported that following his arrest, Uhlarik was suspended from K-State with pay. He had been a professor at K-State since 1970.

Under the plea agreement, the county agreed to dismiss all other charges in the case, including possession of drug paraphernalia. The arrangement also said the county would not file additional charges arising from the existing complaint against Uhlarik, according to the Mercury. Both parties decided to recommend the minimum and immediate probation for a recommended presumptive sentence.

Sentencing is scheduled for 2:30 p.m. May 7 in the Riley County District Court.

Groups help Africa with clean water

By Kendra Stiles
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

World Water Day on March 22 recognized one of the significant problems plaguing the world today.

More than 1.1 billion people worldwide are affected by unclean water, and even more people face problems with unsatisfactory sanitation systems. Kansans are helping lead the charge to fix the problem and wipe out one of the world's most widespread health issues.

widespread health issues.

Steve Beaumont, owner of the Chateau Avalon Hotel and acting president of Village West Rotary Club in Kansas City, Kan., said clean drinking water is a basic need for all people, so the issue should be one of importance to everyone.

"Those of us in Kansas, we take our clean water supply for granted," he said. "Fresh water is never more than five steps away for us. But 80 percent of the world is drinking unsafe water."

Up 'til Dawn had its final event of the year Friday night as a way to say, "thank you" to those who helped raise money for the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital during the past school year.

The event took place at Peters Recreation Complex from 6 p.m. to 4 a.m. with prizes, food and activities.

Students participated in two inflatable games, a Sumo wrestling game and a bungee race, which were two of several activities offered. Cadence, an allmale a cappella group at K-State, also performed, attracting a large crowd.

UPC members gave away several prizes throughout the night. After signing in, people were given raffle tickets for the giveaways. The prizes ranged from an iPod Shuffle with a gift card to the iTunes store to gift cards to area restaurants.

Some families of children who died from cancer shared their experiences with the crowd.

The event was free to those who

A concrete canoe might sound like an oxymoron, but civil engineers at about 150 universities nationwide try to make it work every year.

"It's all about problem solving," said Paul Bruss, senior in civil engineering. "The concrete mix has to be designed to be as strong as possible without being too heavy. The hull of the canoe must be designed to distribute weight well while also being fast and agile."

Bruss joined the K-State team after seeing a 1970s team picture in the hallway of the Department of Civil Engineering building.

"I honestly thought right at that second that it could potentially be the coolest engineering club at K-State," he said. "Who else gets to compete in something as awesome as racing canoes made of floating concrete?"

The competition began at K-State about 30 years ago and has grown into an elaborate four-part challenge.

The first part is a series of five races testing the canoe on speed and agility. The second quarter of the teams' points come from displays each team prepares, which highlight the canoes' aesthetics and construction processes.

The third part of the competition is a 30-page paper detailing the history of the school, development and testing of the canoe and construction process. The team will submit its paper Friday

WOMAN STOPPED WEARING GIRDLE OF LIVE CROCODILES

IERUSALEM - A woman was caught with three crocodiles strapped to her waist at the Gaza-Egypt border crossing after guards noticed that she looked "strangely fat," officials said.

The woman's odd shape raised suspicions at the Rafah terminal in southern Gaza on Thursday

A body search by a female border guard turned up the animals, each measuring about 20 inches long, concealed underneath her loose robe, said Maria Telleria, spokesperson for the European observers who run the crossing.

In her defense, the woman said she "was asked" to carry the crocodiles, said Wael Dahab. spokesperson for the Palestinian guards at the crossing.

Dahab said the animals were likely meant for sale to Gaza's small zoo or to private owners. The crocodiles would fetch "good money," even in the impoverished territory, he said.

In Gaza, the animals can fetch about $500 - roughly two months' salary for a low-ranking police officer.

RETIREES FIND WII NOT JUST FOR THE GRANDKIDS

LOS ANGELES - Until two weeks ago, Ruth Ebert never had the slightest interest in the video games her granddaughter favors.

"I'm 82 years old, so I missed that part of our culture. Soap operas, yes. Video games, no," said Ebert recently started playing a tennis game on Nintendo Co. Ltd.'s new Wii video game console at the Virginia retirement community she calls home.

Japan's Nintendo has been on a mission to expand the $30 billion global video game market far beyond the children and young males who make up its core consumers.

And the company, a former underdog best known for fun, high-quality games based on offbeat characters like plumbers - think Mario Bros. - has sent shock waves through game industry with the unexpected and runaway success of the Wii.

POLICE: MAN SWIPES 1,500 WOMEN'S UNDIES

PULLMAN, Wash. - A man was charged with theft and burglary after police said they found 93 pounds of women's panties, brassieres and other underwear at his home.

Investigators believe Garth M. Flaherty, 24, took as many as 1,500 undergarments from apartment complex laundry rooms before he was caught, police Cmdr. Chris Tennant said Police found enough underwear in his bedroom to fill five garbage bags, Tennant said.

Flaherty has been jailed on 12 counts of second-degree burglary and one of first-degree theft.

"We were kind of concerned about how to match up bras and panties with victims," Tennant said. "Based on the unique descriptions from a couple of women, we can tie him to those thefts."

The underwear will be held as evidence until the case is resolved, after which their disposition is uncertain, Tennant said.

"Would you really want them back?" he asked. "I would say

PUNGENT PULP: PANDA POOP PERFECT FOR PAPER

BEIJING, China - There's a new saying: when life hands you panda poop, make paper.

Researchers at a giant panda reserve in southern China are looking for paper mills to process their surplus of fiber-rich panda excrement into quality paper.

Liao Jun, a researcher at the Chengdu Giant Panda Breeding Base in Sichuan province, said the idea came to them after a visit to Thailand last year where they found paper made from elephant dung. They thought panda poop would produce an even finer quality paper, he said.

The base is in talks with several paper mills on how to turn the droppings of Jing Jing, Ke Bi, Ya Ya and dozens of other pandas at the base into reams of office paper and rolls of wrapping paper, Liao said.

They hope to have a product line available by next year, he said

Bao Xishun, a 7-foot-9 herdsman from Inner Mongolia, married saleswoman Xia Shujian, who was 5 feet 6 inches tall, several days ago, the Beijing New reported.

Bao's 28-year-old bride is half his age and hailed from his hometown of Chifeng, though marriage advertisements were sent across the world, it said.

"After a long and careful selection, the effort has been finally paid off," the newspaper said.

Bao was confirmed last year by the Guinness World Records as the world's tallest person.

The latter is pronounced something like "Big Joe Henry," but when he starred in the World Baseball Classic, the right-hander proved as tough on announcers as he was on hitters. And with a name like "Dan-

Styles from '80s resurface in movies, music, fashion

By Mandy Stark KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 1980s was the decade when video killed the radio star, slap bracelets were banned from schools, and "ALF" was an epic TV show.

That was more than 20 years ago, but a glimpse at college students today reveals that elements of the '80s still can be found in 2007.

Many college students were too young to be aware of or be concerned with trends during the '80s, said Corey Mayes, senior in elementary education. However, Mayes said some were inspired by seeing family members or celebrity figures on television at an early age, which might be the reason for the resurgence of the '80s to-

"I used to watch my older sister for how she dressed when we were kids," she said. "I always wanted to dress like that, but kids don't always get to pick out what they wear."

Growing up, Mayes said she often heard people make fun of '80s fashion. She knows firsthand - she has a collection of vintage T-shirts from the '80s that were a source of ridicule when she was younger.

"I always used to hear that '80s fashion was the worst, and it was never coming back," she said. "Yet it is coming back. Sometimes I sit back and laugh about how predictable fads can be. Nothing's original any more."

So why are the '80s back? If the decade was filled with such easily ridiculed taste, what's it doing invading fashion runways, movie theaters and radio station playlists?

Thank the babies of the '80s, said Lacy Thompson, senior in theater. In part, the decade has made a comeback because people born in the '80s are old enough to make decisions about what the trends will be, she said.

"I think the '80s are big Thompson again because those of us who grew up then are starting to become the trendsetters," Thompson said.

"We look back to the past and recycle what we know. It's all about adding a modern twist to vintage styles."

That nostalgia can be identified in the clothing young people wear. Thompson said fashion designers often recycle trends from previous decades.

Brennen Clayton, junior in business management, said he agreed. Clothing styles cycle about every 20 years, he said.

"In the '90s, you saw clothes from the '70s, like bell bottoms, reappear in stores," he said. "Now the things from the '80s, like polo shirts, are being picked up."

Clayton said in the past, men would not have worn some of the fashion seen today.

"You would not have seen a guy wear a pink shirt in the '90s," Clayton said, "But now, you see a lot of pastels, which were also big in the '80s, so a pink shirt is OK.

"The '80s were kind of anticool. There were so many different things going on from hair bands to hip-hop.

"There was this big mix of stuff that shouldn't go together but was connected by the

On the big screen, remakes of '80s movies are now popular, Mayes said

"A lot of people think what they see when they go to the theater is new," she said. "Most of the movies are remakes that have returned from a lot of decades, not just the '80s."

"Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" and "Miami Vice" are the latest in a line of '80s icons to make a comeback. Thompson said she has seen three or four new variations of the '80s classic "Can't Buy Me Love" in the past few years. "It's that whole girl-paysguy-to-be-her-boyfriend gig," Dempsey did it first, and best, in my opinion."

The movies aren't the only place the '80s are reappearing. Toys like Cabbage Patch Kids and My Little Pony have become popular again in recent years, and pop stars like Gwen Stefani and Ciara infuse their music with sounds of the '80s, Mayes said. She also said many '80s shows are being released

"You can find shows like 'Quantum Leap' and 'Doogie Howser," she said. "It's great."

Clayton said he enjoys '80s movies like "Ghostbusters" and "Indiana Jones," but receiving the first season of "Miami Vice" on DVD got him started on '80s TV shows. He even has a Don Johnson Halloween cos-

Clayton said he always has been a fan of '80s music.

"It's really upbeat," he said. "It's feel-good music that creates a fun atmosphere. I've always followed '80s bands like The Scorpions, Journey and Corey Hart."

Movies by John Hughes that seemed to define '80s teenagers, like "Sixteen Candles" and "Pretty in Pink," are Thompson's favorite '80s memories.

"I'm not a huge '80s fan except for the movies," Thompson said. "Well, leggings are cool, too. They're a great way to wear a skirt and not be cold."

However, she said certain elements of the decade should not be brought back.

"I definitely think everything worn in the movie 'Flashdance' should stay dead," Thompson said. "Curly perms and spandex, too. A lot of '80s fashion was actually pretty ridiculous."

For Mayes, stirrup pants and slouched socks also are items that should not return.

"I actually saw a pair of stirrup pants in a store not too long ago," she said. "They're one of those fashions that should just stay gone."

Children, adults participate in UPC-organized egg hunt

By Kristin Hodges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children of all ages, including several college students, hunted the grounds of campus for camouflage-colored eggs during Willie's Extreme Egg Hunt Saturday.

Members of the Union Program Council hid candyfilled eggs and other prizes from Bosco Student Plaza to Hale Library for the "Survivor"-themed event, said Kelly Brannin, senior in kinesiology and co-chair of the tradition committee for UPC.

Brannin said about 500 participants searched prizes during the event, which was free to community mem-the hunt only lasted about 15 minutes, but some of the eggs were reserved for children who were late to the event, Brannin said.

"We made sure everyone came away with something," she said

Brannin said the event had been a tradition in years past, but then it did not take place for a while. Last year, UPC members decided to start the tradition again.

Children also participated in a coloring contest at the event, she said.

Brannin said members of UPC judged the pictures after the event, and the three winners would receive buckets filled with coloring items and the movie "Happy Feet."

Nikki Linn, senior in hotel and restaurant management, is the other co-chair for the traditions committee for UPC. She said UPC will display the winners' coloring pages in the K-State Student

Hit | Disabilities Week

K-State for All: Disabilities Week was quite a success. folleyball coach Suzie Fritz experienced life in a wheelchair, many students attended a showing of the excellent documentary "Murderball," and the organizers of the event reached their goal: to raise awareness of disabilities. The wheelchair basketball was especially exciting despite a low number of dunks.

Hit | SpringDance

SpringDance is always worth checking out, and the addition of live music made this year's event even more impressive. The dancers' grace and athleticism showed that they spent many hours preparing for the show. It's great when students in any curriculum get to display their talents, but few subjects are this entertaining to watch.

Hit Clean water efforts

A local group is building a well in Kenya so its citizens can drink clean water. More than 80 percent of the world's ulation drinks unsafe water, so we're proud Kansans are making an effort to help (see story Page 1). It's easy to take clean water for granted, but this group's efforts will bring safe water to people who truly will appreciate it.

Miss | Classroom temperatures

We don't get out of our cages in Kedzie Hall too often, so when it's 70 degrees outside and the heater still is on, it isn't a pleasant place to work. Students also complained about toohot or too-cold temps at Peters Recreation Complex and Hale Library. Mismanaged thermostats waste money and throw one more distraction at students who are stressed already.

Miss | British prisoners

Iran's capture of 15 British sailors sparked international tension. Recently released videos show the sailors in good health, but the tape raises more questions than answers. We hope to see the situation resolved without gunshots or bombs, even if it means more negotiations or a longer wait for the prisoners' release.

Miss | West 'Virgina' wins the NIT

West Virginia's first NIT championship in 65 years was clouded by T-shirts sporting a glaring spelling error — "Virginia" was missing the second "1." We know as well as anyone that misspelled words happen. But unless a jaded Clemson fan pulled off a brilliant sabotage, it's probably time for the T-shirt factory to hire a copy editor.

Pope Benedict approaches preaching with love instead of fire, brimstone

I believe in hell. I don't, however, remember the last time I heard a sermon on it.

Pope Benedict XVI, or Benny, as I like to call him, spoke this week on the need to reaffirm the church's position on hell being a real, tragic and eternal place. Now, many of you probably have the immediate mindset, as I did, that SPENCER this will consist of and has consisted of the preacher yelling from the pulpit about "fire and brimstone" and the eternal damnation that awaits sinners in the pit.

This was the kind of sermon that, when we were little, scared the hell out of us.

Anyway, as with most things in this secular progressive society we live in, the idea that there were actual rules and divine laws that we had to follow just didn't jive with the free-thinking hippies we still deal with today.

So there was a slow removal of these kinds of ideas not only from the sanctuaries but from society as well. People who believed in an eternal punishment for sinners were viewed as ignorant and close-minded until eventually even Catholic masses - the Alamo of traditional Christian values - lacked any sort of warnings about the afterlife.

Well, there's a new pope in town. Benny's here to tell you how it really

Despite his rough exterior, he realizes that today's average Christian is going to be pushed even farther away by the traditional message of damnation, so he's taking a different approach. "Only God's love can change a person's existence from within, and, consequently, the existence of every Illustration by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN society, because only his infinite love liberates from sin, the root of every evil," he said.

What he is saying is that anyone who has really come faceto-face with the love of God would and will want to stay in that grace so badly that he or she will be motivated by love, not fear, when living his or her

> I, for one, think this is a novel approach. I know a slick-talking conservative like me shouldn't be into the lovey-dovey aspects of his oppressive religion, and I should love scaring people to God. But one must remember God doesn't want us to go to hell.

So approaching the concept from the ideology Jesus intended - love - is not only a refreshing approach but also will be helpful in changing the minds of many about the Catholic

I particularly loved the point-missing media coverage of the speech, as newspapers around the world proclaimed, "Pope Says Sinners Burn

They did the same thing when he called on all the religions of the world to reject their teachings of violence in God's name. For that he was "telling Muslims how to behave."

Pope Benedict has, time and time again, been able to preach complicated theology in an accessible and loving manner. Pope John Paul II was known for warm smiles - Benny tells you like it is, and I like it.

Luckily for him, he's got enough sense to smooth it out and make everyone responsive to the message.

LONGING FOR THE SCENT OF LINE-DRIED SHEETS

> Lou Ann Thomas THE TOPEKA CAPITAL-JOURNAL

What ever happened to clotheslines? When I was growing up, everyone had a clothesline. Ours was strung between two steel Ts in the backyard, and every Monday, my mother's wash day, the metal lines would sag with our laundry.

I feel sorry for anyone who hasn't experienced pulling on a shirt that has dried naturally in the sun. I'd often help my mother get the laundry off the line, and as we folded those sheets, I'd press my face into their crisp whiteness, breathing deeply of the sweetness that was now a part of them.

You don't see many clotheslines any more. I suspect it's simply easier to toss everything in the dryer and be done with it. I also miss seeing large, white sheets snapping in the breeze like billowing sails. If you've never experienced the smell of sheets that have flapped freely in the sun all day you've truly missed one of life's greatest pleasures.

RUSSIA'S "COOL WAR" AGAINST THE U.S.

By Konstantin Eggert THE DAILY STAR (LEBANON)

Moscow's growing attention to the Middle East continues, part of a new global strategy espoused by a more assertive and ambitious Russia. President Vladimir Putin pays more attention to the region than Boris Yeltsin ever did.

Putin makes a point of regularly talking to those who people in the United States, and sometimes even Europe, considered pariahs: Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Syrian President Bashar Assad, and the Hamas leadership. Major Russian companies are eyeing the region, and Russian arms manufacturers hold out firmly against Western competitors and continue to irritate Washington by selling arms to Iran and Syria.

Why? Russia's - or rather the Kremlin's - enduring obsession with the U.S. victory in the Cold War. The current policy is aimed at getting at least partially even with America.

Bush wrong to ignore majority, kill Iraq deadlines

Thursday was the closest Capitol Hill will ever get to exciting.

On C-SPAN 3 (saved for committee hearings and late-night airings of X-treme senate proceedings), the Senate Judiciary Committee swung bats at D. Kyle Sampson, former chief of staff and counselor to U.S. attorney General Alberto Gonzales. hoping he'd eventually crack and spill bunches of sweet, sweet political candy.

He did, but the excited, bipartisan frenzy was interrupted several times for more pressing business - passing a version of the Iraq spending bill approved by the House the previous week.

Bush has vowed to veto the bill for two reasons: non-related spending was attached, and it contains several deadlines that Bush must meet. Though the Democrats haven't garnered enough votes to override the veto, the deadlines still are warranted given the circumstances.

There are several arguments against the deadlines, but none of them hold any water.

The first is the tired old catchphrase of "support the troops." Though it was always a vague, empty phrase, the Bush administration has gone through additional back flips to get it to apply in this case. The administration asserts the Democrats are pushing a bill through they know Bush will veto, resulting in delayed funding that won't "support

BROWN the troops." Not only could the same argument be pressed against Bush's veto, but the deadline for funding running out has been misstated purposely. The last $70 billion provided by Congress will run out April 15, but the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service found that the army could shift around enough funding to pay for Iraq operations well into this summer.

Critics of a deadline also point to the near inevitability of Iraq slipping deeper into chaos if our troops leave. But the trend seems to be downward despite troops' presence.

Those championing the current surge, Bush and GOP presidential candidate John McCain, have proven to be out of touch with the situation in Iraq, making easily disproved claims that the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, driving around Baghdad without an armed escort.

Keeping our troops in Iraq is merely prolonging the inevitable, delaying the dying spasms of a failed effort and preventing us from more fruitfully applying our military power elsewhere. After all, funding is largely a zero-sum gain; money or troops applied to Iraq could be used for other causes Domestically, this could boil down to more funding for things like college scholarships (in a blatant grab by this editorialist for your approval). Even if we kept it in the military, the freed-up force could have been applied to secure Afghanistan and not rely so much on the Pakistan's military assistance.

The most common argument against deadlines, however, is that they're too static and inflexible, that they constitute "micromanaging" the war effort and unduly tie Bush's authority to wage a war. Though the constitutionality of this is far beyond the scope of this little editorial to discuss, the argument doesn't count for much in terms of policy.

Many of the tiered deadlines merely require Bush to aim for certain withdrawal goals or certify things like cooperation with the Iraqi government for proper training and equipment for the troops.

Furthermore, Congress can pass additional legislation to shift the deadlines based on the occupation's continued progress later; if the "surge" gains ground, Congress can push the deadline back. Iraqi militias can't just count on the U.S. withdrawal at a set date.

Despite all the evidence against him, all signs point to Bush vetoing the bill. In the meantime, 57 percent of the general population supports deadlines, according to a recent MSNBC/Newsweek poll It's best to give that majority a voice through this legislation, even if the President is deaf to them.

AUTHORITIES ISSUE TSUNAMI WARNING AFTER PACIFIC QUAKE

SYDNEY, Australia - A powerful magnitude-7.6 earthquake struck off the coast of the Solomon Islands on Monday morning, prompting a tsunami warning for other South Pacific states and a lower-level alarm for Hawaii.

The U.S. Geological Survey said the earthquake struck at 7:39 a.m. about 6 miles beneath the sea floor, 217 miles northwest of the islands' capital of Honiara.

The Hawaii-based Pacific Tsunami Warning Center said an earthquake of that strength could cause a destructive tsunami and issued a warning for the Solomon Islands and neighboring Papua New Guinea.

The agency said it was not known if the earthquake caused a tsunami.

TEHRAN, Iran - Iran's state television aired new video Sunday showing two of the 15 captured British sailors pointing to a spot on a map of the Persian Gulf where they were seized and acknowledging it was in Iranian territorial waters.

Britain's Foreign Office immediately denounced the video, saying it was "completely unacceptable for these pictures to be shown on TV."

The captives first appeared on the state-run Arabic-language TV channel Al-Alam in separate video clips looking relaxed in military fatigues and pointing at the same map of the Persian Gulf. They were talking to a camera, but the channel did not air their voices. Two staterun Farsi-language TV stations later carried their voices along with the video.

JERUSALEM - U.S. House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi will tell Syrian leaders this week that Israel only will engage in peace talks if Syria stops supporting Palestinian militants, Israeli officials said Sunday. Her visit to Damascus this week is being criticized by the Bush administration.

The message came during Pelosi's meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert during the Israel part of her Mideast tour.

Israel and Syria are sworn enemies, though peace talks came close to success in 2000 before breaking down.

Washington also considers Syria a sponsor of terror and had asked Pelosi not to visit Damascus.

Focusing on technology

Manhattan, Salina campuses acknowledge progress, areas in need of improvement

By Megan Molitor KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Manhattan and Salina campuses have made technology a focus to help students and faculty

Gail Simmonds, coordinator of instructional technology at K-State-Salina, said 83 percent of classrooms at Salina are fully mediated with projectors, screens, computers and audio-visual devices. But he said this was only the beginning of technological capabilities.

"Thirteen percent of our classrooms are partially mediated, and 90 percent of Salina faculty uses K-State Online to enhance the learning opportunities for students," Simmonds said.

Faculty on the Manhattan campus also consider K-State Online to be an important part of the school's technology.

Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center, said K-State Online was one of many applications developed at the main campus.

"It was created with input. from faculty and students," Gould said. "A new version is released every August, and I think that makes us unique."

Distance education also is important at Salina. Simmonds said 20 percent of the faculty uses Tegrity lectures to deliver distance-education classes to the Manhattan campus, Tuskegee University in Tuskegee, Ala., and Barton County Community College in Great Bend,

"I believe that this will be a major expansion effort for our campus," he said.

In Manhattan, Gould said vice provost Elizabeth Unger makes K-State stand out from surrounding schools.

"She's looking for the next technology innovation to share with faculty and students and is a great listener," Gould said.

Both schools recognize problems that need to be addressed. Gould said the Manhattan campus needs to expand wireless technology capabilities.

"We have a lot of work to do on old buildings," she "Technology just wasn't planned there, and we have to find a way to make that technology happen. It's not always easy, but these are the kinds of things that are harder to work on but doable. They just require more time, money and commit-

Simmonds said the Salina campus has problems of its

"We need to improve outfaculty training to develop their applications and teaching techniques to use the best technologies available," he said. "We spend a significant amount of time developing quality course materials that must be updated to meet current technology requirements for delivery to students."

To do this, Simmonds said the Office of Mediated Education actively has training sessions and serves as a valuable resource.

He said Salina plans to continue its development of technology by obtaining educational materials through Bluetooth technology, a short-range communications system, and faster file-transfer capabilities for video and other materials for students.

Gould said the Manhattan campus has a continual commitment to improve informational technology on campus.

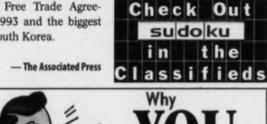

"Five years ago, we had 15 technology classrooms. Now we have 42," she said. "We're always looking to see what everybody wants. We can't always provide it, but we try to make it happen."

Technology is vital to students at both campuses.

"I don't have a great idea on how our technology rates compared to the main campus, but I know we have quite a bit available," said Ben Woodruff, sophomore in aeronautical technology-professional pilot at Salina. "There are a sufficient amount of labs available in the library and classrooms.

"In my program, I believe that we offer the newest and best resources and training equipment."

2 basketball teams show how people with disabilities 'go on' with life

By Andy Nelson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A flurry of flashing spokes, graceful moves and overturned athletes were hallmarks of the K-State for All: Wheelchair and Basketball Game and Clinic Saturday at Peters Recreation Complex.

The centerpiece was the matchup between the Kansas City Thunder and the Kansas Wheelhawks. The outcome was an easy 52-27 victory for the Wheelhawks, but the game was about more than a final score.

Nancy Ruoff looked on as her 12-year-old son Josh warmed up before the game. She said, to her son, playing sports means everything.

Josh was born with spina bifida, which makes getting around without braces or his wheelchair nearly impossible. Josh has been a member of the Wheelhawks for about a month but has been involved in activities like track and soccer for longer

"He loves sports," Nancy said. "He loves watching and playing, and it gives a chance for him to prove to his peers that he can do the same things, just in a different way."

Josh is the only member of the Wheelhawks who is younger than 18, and his mother believes this brings greater benefits to him than just playing a

The game and clinic came at the tail end of K-State's first-ever Disability Awareness Week. Student Governing Association funded the week, and Disability Support Services sponsored the game at the rec. The purpose of the event was to educate people about the abilities of those with handicaps.

"Our goal is to create awareness and positive attitude toward those with disabilities," said Andrea Blair, director of Disability Support Services. "Having a disability is not a deficit but just a difference."

K-State alum and Wheelhawks team representative Jarvis Stirn worked with DSS to make the event a possibility. Stirn graduated in 2000 with a degree in mechanical engineering, and he works in Olathe, Kan., designing tools for construction use. Stirn said he hopes to build club wheelchair basketball programs at K-State and the University of Kansas to rival those already started at the univer-"It's been really good for him to have good exam-sities of Missouri, Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

The ultimate goal, Stirn said, is to have a high level of competition in wheelchair basketball within the Big 12 Conference.

However, if it were not for Jim Kesler inviting him to come out and practice with the team, Stirn said his passion for helping to push along accessible sports might not have come as far.

Kesler has been involved in many sports himself, which has given him perspective on the benefits of sports for disabled people.

"Most people that are disabled that are out competing in sports have got really good attitudes," Kesler said. "They've dealt with disabilities, and life is

K-State gets blown out, responds with victory

By Austin Meek and Ryne Witt KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State staged another eighthinning rally to claim a 7-3 victory Sunday and win the weekend series against Texas Tech.

After Saturday's 16-5 drubbing, the Wildcats responded by taking two straight games from the Red Raiders and improving to 20-8 overall and 3-3 in Big 12 Conference play.

"It shows some character," said coach Brad Hill. "It shows our guys are settling in a little bit."

The Wildcats trailed 3-2 after seven innings Sunday but plated five runs in the eighth. Sophomore Rob Vaughn, who went 2-for-2 with two RBI, led off the inning with a double that chased Texas Tech starter Josh Scofield to the bench.

Sophomore Tyler Link followed with a bunt down the third-base line. Pitcher Aaron Odom fielded the ball and fired to third, but Vaughn beat the throw easily, much to the disgust of Tech coach Larry Hays.

"We talked about what we were going to with the bunt, and we didn't do it," Hays said.

After pinch hitter Brett Scott was hit by a pitch to load the bases, sophomore Drew Biery launched a sacrifice fly to the warning track in right.

Back-to-back singles from freshman Justin Bloxom and sophomore Byron Wiley and a bases-loaded walk to senior Eli Rumler put K-State ahead 5-3.

Third baseman Nate Tenbrink capped the rally with a double to the College basketball's coaching carousel keeps spinning faster by the minute, and frankly, we're getting a little nauseous Make no mistake, though - we're loving every minute of it.

In case you missed it, here's what has happened so far.

■ Tubby Smith left the barren wasteland of Kentucky for the basketball paradise known as Minnesota, where the trees are laden with 7-foot centers and the rivers flow with Gatorade. Ashley Judd was not immediately available for comment.

■ Steve Alford jumped from the sinking ship at Iowa and washed ashore in New Mexico.

Former New Mexico coach Ritchie McKay took over as head coach at Liberty University, the institution founded by outspoken right-wing Jerry Falwell. We've actually got a lot of respect for McKay, because that might be the toughest job in America. One bad season could land him on Falwell's bad side, and that's not pleasant. Just ask the purple Teletubby.

Of course, this is only the beginning. More changes are on the way, with names like Florida's Billy Donovan, KU's Bill Self and Texas A&M's Billy Gillispie churning in the rumor mill. The latest reports from The Associated Press said Gillispie agreed to a new contract with the Aggies that would raise his base salary to $1.75 million. Reports of the new contract surfaced last week, but Gillispie remained mum on subject, leading some to speculate he might entertain offers from Kentucky or Arkansas. Personally, we think he was just holding out for a subscription to ESPN The Magazine.

It now appears Gillispie will stay put, which means Kentucky will focus its search elsewhere. Donovan, who played for Rick Pitino at Providence and coached under him at Kentucky, seems like the first choice to replace Smith in Lexington.

ESPN.com reported Saturday that Kentucky was prepared to offer Donovan a contract worth about $3 million a season, the kind of money reserved for elite college coaches and over-the-hill relief pitchers.

Donovan apparently had the nerve to insinuate he had better things to do than chit-chat with the media about his coaching future. Something about a Final Four ... we weren't really listening.

Our favorite coaching search has to be the one going on in the hallowed halls of Michigan. After the Wolverines canned Tommy Amaker, they took their quest for a new coach to unprecedented (and somewhat illogical) extremes.

They posted a classified ad. "The University of Michigan

GLF | Alefs returns home for Shocker Classic

Today, Spencer Alefs will go back to a course he has played a couple of times in his day.

Alefs, a freshman for the K-State men's golf team, will tee it up with the rest of his teammates in the 16team Shocker Classic today and Tuesday at his home course, the Wichita Country Club. A 2005 graduate of Wichita Southeast

High School, Alefs is a member of the country club and has been a frequent visitor to the course for many years.

"I honestly can't remember how many... times I've played it," he said. "I've been a ... member forever, and I've played there ever since I could pick up a club."

He said the best round he ever shot at the course was a 68, and he said he wanted to beat that score sometime during this week's three-round tournament. He will be playing as an individual. Sophomore Robert Streb, freshman Mitchell Gregson, junior Kyle Yonke, sophomore Joe Kinney and freshman Joe Ida will play for the overall team score.

Alefs said he will have a number of people coming to watch him play, and he is excited about the opportunity to play in front of many family members and friends.

"He's probably experienced any condition that could possibly occur during the tournament," said coach Tim Norris. "If the wind starts changing directions from what we have practiced, then he will be the only one that knows what to do because of that experience. But it doesn't matter how many times you have played a course - you still have to hit the shots and make the putts."

This will be the first time the Wildcats have participated in the event since a 10th-place finish in 2000.

RUN | Track team returns with 4 titles, 1 qualifier

Everyone knows the saying, "Houston, we have lift-off."

This weekend, senior women's high jumper Kaylene Wagner and senior men's pole vaulter Bryce Bergman lifted off to win their events. During the weekend at the Victor Lopez

Bayou Classic, K-State brought home four event titles and one NCAA Midwest regional Wagner did something she couldn't do during the indoor season: defeat Big 12

Conference indoor champion Destinee Hooker of Texas. Wagner won by jumping 6-3/4. It was her second victory in a row during the outdoor season. She won last week with a mark of 5-10 3/4. Bergman won his event with a height of 16-6 3/4. It also was a regional qualifying mark. The mark was less than an inch away from his personal best of 16-7 1/4. It was his first. outdoor contest of the season.

Sophomore high jumper Scott Sellers did not participate in the high jump this weekend; instead, he competed in and won the triplejump. Competing in his home state, he jumped a mark of 48-7 1/4.

Sophomore sprinter Mike Myer continued to chase his hero, former K-State football player Terence Newman. Myer won the 100-meter dash this weekend with a time of 10.71. It-was .23 seconds behind his time last week, which was the second-fastest time in school history behind Newman.

TEN | Tennis team extends losing streak to 9 matches

K-State had its closest match in more than a month Saturday, but errors in Saturday and Sunday's matches eventually caused the Wildcat tennis team to fall to Oklahoma and Oklahoma State

K-State (2-11, 0-4 Big 12 Conference) lost to Oklahoma (3-9, 3-3 Big 12) Saturday in a 4-3 match. The Wildcats started the day off positively, sweeping the doubles matches.

However, a furious singles rally allowed Oklahoma to net four victories. The only Wildcat players to win were junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia against Christi Baxley (7-6 [5], 7-5) and sophomore Katerina Kudlackova against Chelsea Orr (7-5, 6-2, 7-6 [5]).

"Fortunately things went our way in the doubles," coach Steve Bietau said. "We just" couldn't get the last victory in the singles."

Sunday, K-State traveled to Stillwater, Okla., to take on No. 52 Oklahoma State (12-5, 4-2 Big 12) but eventually fell to the Cowboys, 6-1. The only Wildcat win came at No. 1 singles when junior Viviana Yrureta beat Iryna Tkachenko (6-4, 6-4).

"I think errors were the story more than : anything," Bietau said. "Some are forced by your opponent and some are avoidable. Our goal is to eliminate the avoidable mistakes." I think you always have to play clean or you're creating work for yourself."

K-State will face lowa State Wednesday in Ames, Iowa, in a make-up match from March 2, when inclement weather forced the match to be postponed. They return home Saturday to face Texas Tech.

Gates Foundation donates millions to help D.C. students

By Michele Williams U-WIRE (DC BUREAU)

WASHINGTON - Many D.C. high school students smiled last Thursday with the announcement of a $122 million grant that will help students from low-income families attend college.

Funded by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the grant will support the city's effort to double the number of high-school and college graduates by 2010. One item the grant will create is the D.C. Achievers scholarships. The scholarships will be given to more than 2,000 students, who come from areas where one in three students graduates from "high school within five years and only one in 20 high school graduates earns a college degree within five years," according to the release.

"Our desire is to eliminate or reduce the amount of loans students have to take out for college," said Susan Byers, executive director of National Replications for the College Success Foundation.

The scholarships and additional support, such as academic counseling, will be provided over the next 10 years, which will help the district's other goal of tripling the number of graduates by 2014.

The D.C. College Success Foundation, an arm of the Washington state-based nonprofit organization, will award the first scholarships to 175 juniors in May. The students will come from six high schools: Anacostia Senior High School, Ballou Senior High School, H.D. Woodson Senior High School, Maya Angelou-Evans Public Charter School, Thurgood Marshall Academy Public Charter School and Friend-Collegiate Academy ship Public Charter School. Each student will receive a $10,000 scholarship each year for up to five years.

At this time, only students from the six schools will receive the scholarships, Byers

Each spring, students in their junior year will be selected based on a wide range of factors.

"In order to apply for scholarships, students will have to meet a financial threshold, they have to be on target for graduation and they must [show] they're going to apply to a bachelor's degree program," Byers said. "We also look at their [leadership] potential, goal-setting [ability], and resiliency."

Students who come from families that make less than $50,000 are eligible to apply.

The resiliency will look at how well the student has overcome obstacles which is important in completing school, Byers said.

The D.C. College Success Foundation will work with another nonprofit group, the D.C. College Access Program, to execute the scholarship program. DC-CAP will manage the school-based part of the program. Once selected, students work with a mentor for the remainder of their high-school years and while in college.

Ten million dollars of the grant will also go toward expanding DC-CAP's $40 million capital campaign.

One of the campaign's goals is to increase DC-CAP's $2,000 scholarships to $3,000. Students receive these scholarships, or last-dollar awards, to cover book and room and board expenses, once the group finds all other aid for them such as institutional aid.

Unlike with the D.C. Achiever's scholarships, DC-CAP's scholarships are open to all students.

"We're sort of a safety net to make sure every single student in the schools has an opportunity to go to college," said Argelia Rodriguez, DC-CAP's president and CEO.

DC-CAP also provides services such as academic mentoring to students starting in their ninth grade to their last year of college.

The $10 million will also help the campaign's second goal of extending their services to students attending D.C. charter schools. This fall, DC-CAP will be in four D.C. charter schools: Friendship Collegiate Academy Public Charter School, Maya Angelou-Evans Public Charter School, Thurgood Marshall Academy Public Charter School and the Cesar Chavez Public Charter School for Public Policy.

The privately funded group hopes to be in every school in

The grant helps the issues discussed in the "Double the Number for College Success" report, which was released last

The study found that in the city, "only 9 percent of incoming ninth graders complete college 'on time'" and that "the remainder - the more than 90 percent" who graduate high school - "never start college or fail to finish their degree."

To date, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation has contributed more than $13 million to the city and $1.5 billion nationwide for education.

Schizophrenia indicator found

By Monali R. Agarwal HARVARD CRIMSON (HARVARD)

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. - A team including researchers from Harvard Medical School has discovered a genetic marker for schizophrenia, according to a paper published Tuesday in the journal Molecular Psychology.

The data was collected using Whole Genome Association - a new technology that allowed the scientists to study all the possible variations of each gene, rather than just one or two at a time.

"WGA permits us to examine 500,000 SNPs (genetic variations) across the entire genome in a single test," said Todd Lencz, the first author of

The discovery was a joint initiative between the Medical School and the Feinstein Institute for Medical Research.

Lencz, a Feinstein researcher, credited the Harvard team with using the new technology to collect the data.

"Harvard has been at the cutting edge of the application of this WGA technology, and had primary responsibility over producing high-quality genetic data using this very complicated and sensitive equipment," he said.

Schizophrenia is a disorder known to cause hallucinations, distorted thinking, and a reduced emotional response, said Anil Malhotra, also of the Feinstein Institute and a senior investigator in the study.

The symptoms usually appear during the late teens and early 20s, he said, making the discovery especially pertinent to college students.

Paul Barreira, director of Behavioral Health and Academic Counseling at the Bureau of Study Counsel, said five Harvard undergraduates were diagnosed with schizophrenia by University Health Services during the last academic year.

Barreira speculated young people diagnosed as schizophrenic in high school are less likely to come to Harvard.

"If anything, Harvard should have less rather than more cases of schizophrenia," he said.

Starbucks founder speaks on ethics

By Kate McClelland THE OBSERVER (NOTRE DAME)

SOUTH BEND, Ind. Starbucks founder and chairman Howard Schultz. who visited the University of Notre Dame on Thursday, told an audience on campus that "success is not an entitlement - it must be earned."

Schultz discussed his business practices and passed on lessons he has learned from leading Starbucks in a talk titled "Entrepreneurship and Ethics" in Mendoza's Jordan Auditorium.

He emphasized the importance of striking a "balance between profitability and social consciousness," he said, because companies that are authentic and ethical will do better in the long run than companies simply out to make an immediate profit.

Schultz, the former chief executive officer of Starbucks, received the eighth-annual Theodore M. Hesburgh C.S.C. Award for Ethics in Business for his superior commitment to earning respect and success within the business world while maintaining the highest ethical standards in all of Starbucks' business practices.

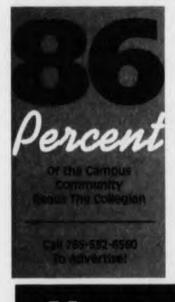

Starbucks - listed as No. 16 on Fortune's list of Best Companies to Work For has made a commitment to its employees by offering them superior health-care and stock options, even for those who work fewer than 40 hours a week.

Schultz said his dedication to his company's employees grew out of his early childhood experiences.

While Schultz was growing up in a housing project in Brooklyn, his family suffered when his father was injured on the job and received no benefits or workers' compensation. Schultz said these memories made him committed to providing health care to his employees.

He encouraged the audience to take an active role in trying to change government policy, saying the nation's status with 47 million Americans uninsured is "fracturing the humanity of America."

7 vie for open USD 383 Board of Education positions

Service on committees prepares candidate for possible Board of Education position

By Kristin Hodges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Curt Herrman's interest and work in technology and business have taken him around the world to places like India and the United Kingdom, but they also have kept him busy at home in Manhattan

Herrman has been active in a variety of areas, including working in technology in the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district for several years. This year, he is increasing his involvement by running for a Board of Education seat.

As a parent of two students in the district, Herrman has served as the PTA president and Site Council president. He said he also has served on the district budget advisory committee, the redistricting committee and the technology committee.

Herrman said he also has done volunteer work for the district, which includes writing more than 15 Youth Education Stipend grants that have helped start math and French clubs in the school district. "I've been very involved in the district," he said. "I like helping kids. It gives you a good feeling of satisfaction."

Herrman said he also serves on the academic advisory board at his alma mater, Fort Havs State University. where he graduated with dual degrees in business administration and computer

He said he plans to focus

on two issues he thinks are important for the school district. One of the areas is technology, because the school district is behind other schools and has been trying to emulate what the other schools are doing, he said. "We need to become that school that other schools come to see," Herrman said. "I want us to become the

The other issue Herrman said he is passionate about is increasing pay and providing benefits for non-certified employees of the school district. With an increase in those areas, he said employees like paraprofessionals would stay in the district longer.

Grandmother of local children wants to increase student equality in district

By Brian Tosh

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being a grandmother to four children in the Manhattan school district inspired Karen Hummel to run for the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board.

"I'm interested in the education they will receive," she Hummel said she would like to see student achievement levels become more equal.

"In talking with teachers and administrators, I am concerned that the achievement gap is growing and the number of underachievers is increasing." Hummel said. "There are precedents for solving this problem. We need to look at the successful models and implement them in USD 383."

She said another concern is schools' infrastruc-

"Some schools are old, and maintenance was put off when numbers were decreasing," Hummel said. "Now that the numbers are increasing, the work needs to as well."

Hummel retired from an engineering career in California and moved back to Manhattan two years ago. Being retired would give her more time to focus on a schoolboard position, she said.

"I could spend time in each of the schools to understand the circumstances of each school, including the ways in which student needs are met, to serve the best interests of the learning community now and for the long term," she

Hummel ran the Women in Engineering and Science Program at K-State for 10 years before going to California. She said group members encouraged junior-high and high-Hummel school students in three CANDIDATE states to study science and engineering. Hummel said experience as a parent and grandparent of children with a wide spectrum > of interests and talents has given her a sense of what children need.

> "It is critically important that children believe they can succeed and that they get the help and direction to do so," Hummel said. "They need opportunities to explore different avenues and discover their areas of natural ability and inter-

Former schoolteacher hopes to improve facilities, salaries for paraprofessionals

By Kristen Roderick KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One school board candidate said she hopes to eliminate the high turnover rate for paraprofessionals and classified workers in the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 district.

Susan Marshall said raising salaries for these workers is one of the issues she is most passionate about in her campaign to become one of the seven members of the Manhattan-Ogden school

"They make like $6.50 or $7 an hour, and they have no benefits," she said. "Some are working with our most needy children?

Though Marshall said she had no answers on how to raise workers' salaries, she wants to take the issue to the school board.

She said she realizes raising salaries and adding benefits for these workers could be expensive.

"We'd have to get on the board and see where that money come from," she said. "I want to get on the board and see, as a that situation."

Marshall said she would like to help improve the facilities around Manhattan's schools.

group, how we can improve

"Their facilities are older, and they need revamping," she said. "They're already starting to deal with that with the facility committee."

Being a part of a school district is nothing new for

She said most of Marshall the people who are on school boards do not have that experience, and she could bring her knowledge of what goes on in the classroom to the USD 383 school board.

She now assists her husband, who is an instructor at

"I think that being a teacher and knowing what goes on in the classroom brings another aspect to the board," she said.

"This would be a great way for me to use my expertise."

Lifelong Manhattan resident seeks to give back to schools he attended, raise wages

By Whitney Hodgin KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lifelong Manhattan resident Adam Dolezal said he wants to improve the school district where he once was a student.

Dolezal, Manhattan Parks and Recreation supervisor, is running for the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education. If elected, he said he would raise pay for school employees and update classroom technology.

"I want to increase salaries for both teachers and support staff," Dolezal said. "I'd also like to extend support-staff benefits to either full or partial health-care coverage."

Bus drivers, maintenance workers and food-service workers are examples of support staff.

Dolezal said he wants to improve classroom technology by supplying more computers and replacing outdated overhead projectors to match the educational resources available.

"If they're still using overheads, it's just not as effective," he said. "You can't do a PowerPoint presentation on an overhead."

Dolezal

Dolezal said he also wants to improve working conditions by installing central air conditioning in all of the schools

Dolezal said he understands the need for another elementary school to make room for growing enrollments, but not another high school.

"I don't want two high schools in this town," he said.

"East is only half full, so one option would be for us to move the sophomore class from West to East."

Dolezal, a 2000 K-State graduate in secondary education, said running for a position on the school board was a goal he wanted to reach by age 30.

"I'm 31 now, so I knew it was time," he said.

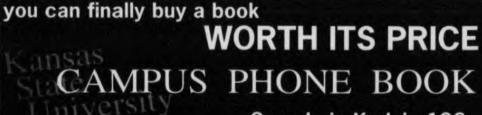

Dolezal, who is the director and supervisor of the Manhattan Ice Rink, said he wants to restore the school district to its former glory days and decided to run because of civic duty.

"I'm a product of the school district and have always wanted to give back," he said. "Education and kids are what's important to me."

School board president seeks second term to improve technology for students

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sitting Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education president wants to keep his Dave Colburn said he wants to continue serving the Manhattan community.

"I have worked really hard in the past four years," Colburn said. "I come to issues with an open mind and no set agenda. I have creative solutions, especially when solving problems."

Five years ago, the school board closed Bluemont Elementary School due to budget problems. Colburn was not on the board at the time but said he was vocal in meetings.

The board is reopening the school this fall due to enrollment growth. This is one of Colburn's biggest interests, he said.

"There are so many more growing possibilities that are more positive than four years ago," Colburn said.

Colburn said he plans to help make decisions for growth associated with Fort Riley.

He said the district also faces many challenges with technology.

"Small school districts can supply a laptop for every student," he said. "We hope to have a laptop for every five students, but it will take two to three years to get there."

Colburn said another challenge the district faces is the demand for teachers. Because many teachers will retire in the coming years, school districts are going to face competition, he said. Colburn said he encourages students to become teachers because of the open job market. Colburn said he wants to maintain the partnership the Manhattan school district has with K-State's Professional Development Program.

"This relationship benefits us greatly because of the students who help out in the classroom." Colburn said.

Colburn attended K-State, where he met his wife, Sandy, more than 30 years ago. They have three daughters who attend school at USD 383. Colburn is the manager of The Pathfinder, a downtown sporting goods store.

Mother encouraged by school-aged son to improve conditions for low-income students

By Mike Kelly KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amber Marden began her campaign for a seat on Manhattan's school board based on a comment from her son.

"We were talking about the fact that we were saddened by our community's interest," said Marden, candidate for the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education. "It was two days before the filing deadline, and there were two candidates for four open spots, and he said, 'Mom, why don't you just do it?"

A Manhattan resident, for 22 years, Marden said she wants to help bring the school district into the future by prioritizing building maintenance, rewarding teachers and re-evaluating changes made due to the population increase. However, she said representing her demographic on the school board is crucial.

"I come from a low-income family, and sometimes I think people from my area don't give their opinion enough because they don't feel empowered," Marden said.

One issue Marden said she hopes to address is Manhattan High School's proposal to have an optional seventh hour for students. She said the variety in scheduling would be difficult for families without alternative modes of transportation.

"I think it would really hurt that income level," Marden said.

She said she also is concerned about the physical condition of the district's buildings, especially the high school.

"Manhattan High School is falling apart," Marden said,

"It's disgusting."
Some of the issues Marden listed were unsanitary conditions in restrooms and broken glass in the parking lot.

"To me, it's a health issue," she said, "and I don't think that it's been addressed because it hasn't been brought to the school board."
Though projects like locker replacements are in progress at Manhattan High, Marden said more changes are necessary.

"I think we need to prioritize," Marden said.

"I'd like to see us think that process through a little bit more."

Incumbent hopes for 1 more term to expand student extra- and co-curricular activities

By Hannah Blick KANIAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several issues have caught the attention of Nancy Knopp, incumbent candidate for the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education.

"I believe that our number-one goal is to maximize academic achievement," Knopp said. "There are constantly new ways in which to improve upon the achievement of our kids."

One such issue is the expansion of extra- and co-curricular activities at the district's schools.

Though the district has a healthy amount of these activities, Knopp said efforts need to be made to guarantee all students are involved.

"Extra-curricular and cocurricular activities provide very important opportunities for our children to experience teamwork, leadership and adult mentorship," she said.

"We should always be looking for opportunities to expand on this."

Knopp said she was involved in adding several of these activities to the seventh-grade curriculum at both Manhattan middle schools. After looking at the data, it is evident the participation level at both middle schools has increased, and students enjoy their extra involvement time, she said.

Knopp said she also wants to focus on financing.

She said she wants a budget that provides for all the district's needs, including teachers' salaries, maintenance and academic programs

"It is important to me that we build a budget that not only provides for all the district's needs but that also balances the financial realities and burden on the taxpayers," Knopp said.

The recent increase in enrollment at local elementary schools has prompted discussion of opening a second high school in Manhattan. Knopp said the increase in elementary-aged students does not mean high-school enrollment will increase as well, because the boost is coming from mobile Fort Riley military families.

"I don't think we're anywhere near needing a new high school," she said.

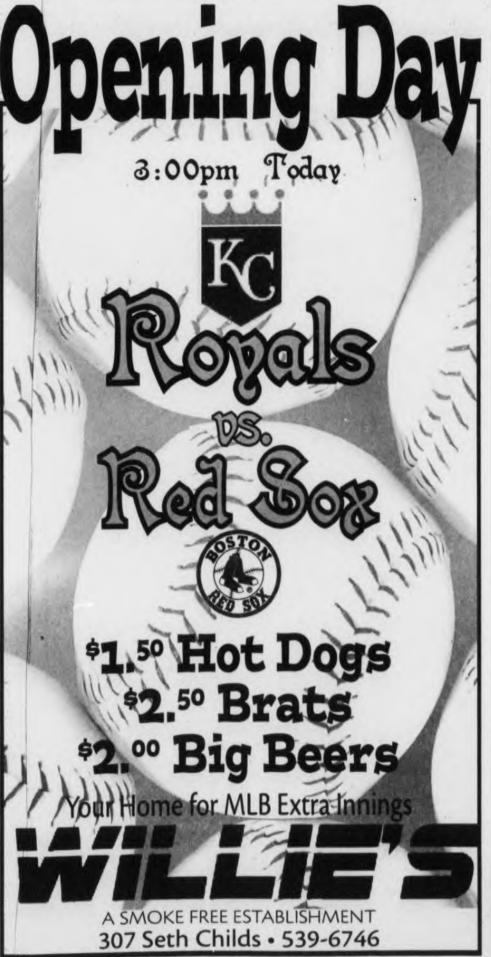

"But we need to stay on top of the projections in case the need arises."

Kansas medical school seeks to link with nonprofit hospital

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Kan. – The deadline for a deal linking the University of Kansas medical school with a nonprofit, Missouri-based hospital system passed Saturday without a signed agreement.

But the university's hospital board in Kansas City, Kan., this week approved a set of "guiding principles" that sets a new goal of having the arrangement by May 31.

"We think there's a lot of hard work still left to come to bring these to a definitive agreement," said hospital spokesperson Dennis McColloch.

The hospital is negotiating a new affiliation agreement with the university's Medical Center, which shares the hospital campus. The center already has signed a letter of intent to affiliate with the St. Luke's system, of Kansas City, Mo., which operates 11 hospitals.

"While deadlines are important in any negotiation, it is more important that we get this agreement right, not that we get it fast," said center spokesperson Amy Jordan Wooden.

A spokeswoman from St. Luke's declined to comment on the issue Friday.

The center is the university's medical arm and houses the schools of medicine, nursing and allied health. The hospital split from the center in the late '90s.

Kansas City leaders have pushed for the center to affiliate with St. Luke's, saying it will strengthen the area's attempts to attract bioscience research. But university hospital officials have called for caution, afraid the deal could make the hospital less competitive and drain state resources.

State lawmakers have added language to a budget bill that would force any final agreement to go before a committee of the governor and top legislative leaders for approval.

The original letters of intent, signed in February, called for the deal to be finalized by March 31.

In its guiding principles, the hospital board said it wouldn't approve the final agreement until it saw a final version of the deal between the center and St. Luke's.

Man admits to poisoning prairie dogs

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WINONA, Kan. - The chairman of the Logan County Commission admitted to a newspaper that he illegally set out prairie dog poison on land he farms.

Commissioner Doug Mackley told The Hays Daily News he used the poison Rozol early last week, 11 days after the federal cutoff date. He was not repentant, though.

"I screwed up. That's all there is to it," Mackley said. "They won't take care of their damn prairie dogs, and they invaded my field."

vaded my field."

Mackley was referring to Lillian and Donald J. Becker, whose pasture is next to the field where Mackley placed the poison.

The Beckers are among the defendants in a lawsuit filed by the county commission, which is seeking to force some landowners to move cattle off pasturelands so prairie dogs can be poisoned.

Two complaints were filed last week with the Kansas Department of Agriculture. One deals with Mackley's use of Rozol past the allowable date and the other with allegations of illegal above-ground bait stations in Logan County.

The Beckers filed the complaint against Mackley on Wednesday, two days after they saw him in the field on an allterrain vehicle.

They said they did not notice that Rozol had been set out until the next day, when they were putting out phostoxin – another prairie dog poison – on their own land.

Mackley said he plans to plant corn on the field and does not want the crop attacked by prairie dogs. "I'm just like every other farm out here fighting prairie dogs," he said. "Everybody thinks they're cute. They're a prairie rat – that's all they amount to."

The Beckers also called Logan County Sheriff Pat Parsons, who said he would turn the case over to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to avoid a conflict of interest.

Lillian Becker said there was not much Rozol on the field treated by Mackley, "but one kernel is illegal."

Mackley said other than the lawsuit over prairie dog control, he has tense relations with the Beckers.

"They're mad at me," he said.
"They fenced in a county road, and we made them move it.
They've been mad at me ever since"

The Beckers said the fence did not impede traffic on the road.

"We got it done in the eighth," Bloxom said. "When it comes down to it, we just get clutch."

K-State also got clutch pitching from reliever Trevor Hurley, who entered the game with the bases loaded and one out in the fifth. Hurley got Texas Tech's Kyle Martin to ground to Tenbrink for an inning-ending double play.

"Hurley was really good," Hill said. "Coming in and inducing that double play right away was the swing of the game."

Hurley picked up the win for K-State, while Odom earned the loss for Texas Tech,

SATURDAY: GAME 1

K-State's pitching unraveled in the first game of a doubleheader Saturday, giving up 15 hits and 16 runs in a 16-5 loss to Texas Tech.

Wildcat starting pitcher junior Chase Bayuk never seemed to get on track, giving up eight runs in 2 1/3 innings pitched. Bayuk (2-2) threw 77 pitches, and his ERA moved from 3.16 to 6.75.

The Wildcat bullpen did not provide much relief. The three relievers pitched 4 2/3 innings and gave up eight runs.

"We had seven or eight walks," Hill said. "We can't win games (doing that), and Bayuk is better than that."

The pitching was not the only thing missing for the Wildcats. Their bats only showed up for the fifth inning. In that inning, they collected four hits and four walks for five runs.

That kept the score somewhat close at 9-5, but the Red Raiders pulled away in the next two innings with seven runs.

Tech's starter sophomore AJ Ramos went 4 2/3 innings for the win. He gave up all of the Red Raiders' runs in the fifth, moving to 6-1 on the year.

SATURDAY: GAME 2

After being blown out in the first game, the Wildcats bounced back, beating Tech 4-3 Saturday evening.

"We did a good job," Hill said of his team reacting to the blowout. "I was a little ner? vous."

Junior Brad Hutt started for the Wildcats and pitched 6 2/3 innings while giving up three runs. He gave up eight hits but always seemed to get himself out of jams until the sixth, in which he gave up two runs.

After Hutt's pitching, the K-State bats and relief pitching took over.

In the eighth, the Wildcats had five straight hits to score three runs and take the lead.

"They weren't all pretty,"
Hill said. "Some great fierce, competitive at-bats for us."
K-State got on the board first in the in the fourth inning. Senior Eddie Vasquez doubled to right center and was driven in two batters later by freshman Justin Bloxom.

Tech added one in the seventh to make the game 3-1.

Bloxom was the sar offensively, going 3-for-4, all of them doubles, with two REIs.

"(I was) just trying to go up there and put something in play," Bloxom said. "Get a walk if I can. Just get some RBIs in and get some runs."

Rumor has it the Wolverines have targeted West Virginia coach John Beilein (he must have seen the ad). If Beilein were to leave WVU, we have to wonder how hard our own Bob Huggins would listen if his alma mater came calling.

However, we're not too worried. It probably will take Michigan several years to sort through all those applications.

Heck, we figured we might as well throw our hat into the ring too.

OK, so maybe we don't technically have any prior coaching experience, but we can type 80 words a minute and we're proficien in Excel and Quicken.

Can John Beileinsay that?

Student dancers, musicians, choreographers show hard work, training

By Jessi Hernandez KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Their bodies are well trained, and heir movements are practiced. They glide about their playing field with grace and ease. They have worked for months, and on opening night, they are ready to bring down the house.

For the dancers, musicians and choreographers whose work was on display the opening night of Spring-Dance 2007 Friday, there was no opponent and no point system. No one went won a trophy or other symbol of his or her achievement. Instead, the months of mental and physical preparation they underwent helped them each a different goal: putting on a good show.

"It's nice to finally get to show night," said Saylor Burgess, senior in dance and women's studies. "We've just been working endless hours, and it's so nice to have an audience that's my favorite part ... because even though it's the same dance I've been doing for months, tonight, it's going to be different."

This year, SpringDance, the annual roduction members of the Departent of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance put on, included some new features, one of which was live music. Dancers and choreographers teamed with members of the Department of Music to add what Burgess called an element of professionalism.

"When you go to dance productions like in New York (City) or somewhere like that, you will see live music most of the time," she said.

Members of the KSU Orchestra, under the direction of David Littrell, professor of orchestral music, accompanied several pieces, as did many other musicians, some of whom were not affiliated with K-State.

For the piece "Take Five," choreographer Julie Pentz, assistant professor of dance, included two musicians on stage and a live Internet feed, which allowed musician Allan Molnar to accompany on percussion from his studio in New York City.

Faculty like Pentz were not the only ones to incorporate live musicians. For her piece, "Untitled," choreographer and solo dancer Hallie Friend, junior in sociology, featured Mikey Needleman, senior in social science, on guitar. Callie Peterson, senior in theater, utilized live percussionists for the uptempo, modern jazz piece she choreo-

"I really enjoyed doing the student choreography piece," said Julie Powell, junior in accounting. "It was really neat to almost be a part of the choreography because it seemed more like a group effort."

The live music provided an element that could attract audience members whose primary interest might not be in dance, said Meg Wilson, sophomore in interior architecture and product

'Blades of Glory' an easy comedy for Ferrell fans

"Blades of Glory" ***

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

Comedies usually fall into three ters. First, there's the top level - good movies that earn their laughs but don't accessarily rely on comedy alone. Little Miss Sunshine" and almost any oen Brothers film fit here.

The second tier includes funny lms existing for one purpose: aughter. This category is flooded with early Adam Sandler films, the entire Mel Brooks library and my personal avorites, "Dumb and Dumber" and

The third category - the bottom feeders - includes the formulaic, unentertaining comedies that litter the top 10 each week but fade into obscurity shortly after. "Dumb and Dumberer," "Nacho Libre" and almost any comedy with a "2" in the title go

Will Ferrell's latest film, "Blades of Glory," is tough to place.

It features Ferrell and Jon Heder as figure skaters who team up after being banned from competition.

Ferrell has reigned over the second tier in recent years, but he has more than enough failures to call every new project into question. Does anyone remember "Kicking and Screaming?" I certainly hope not, but it proves that even Hollywood's best and brightest fail miserably from time to time.

The film's second lead, Heder, has a far less illustrious career. "Napoleon Dynamite" seems to have cursed him into to an ugly world of typecasting - a world in which every character has to be socially awkward in a slightly amusing way. I wanted to place "Blades of Glory" in the bottom tier. It doesn't bring anything new to the table; Ferrell acts like Ron Burgundy and Ricky Bobby, except this time he skates. (Though, for the record, Chazz Michael Michaels is probably his coolest name yet.) The plot is painfully predictable, and most of the supporting characters are completely wasted.

But despite every reason I had to hate this film, I couldn't put it in the third tier.

The first two thirds of the movie are hilarious, and the final third isn't bad enough to make you forget it. If you've seen the trailer and are still mildly interested, you probably won't be disappointed.

To help pay for construction costs, the Kansas rotary clubs cosponsored a fund raiser with Court Appointed Special Advocates on Friday. The event consisted of a Texas Hold 'Em tournament at Dave and Buster's at The Legends shopping center in Kansas City, Kan.

Museum over budget, closed until June

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA - A year after Old Cowtown Museum nearly closed for good because of debt and lack of visitors, budget problems are forcing the beleaguered attraction to delay its opening for the tourist sea-

The Old West history museum was scheduled to open for the season this weekend, but its board decided to delay the opening until mid-June because the attraction is $50,000 over budget just three months into the year.

Old Cowtown Museum also can't account for up to 16 percent of its artifacts. And it has closed the kitchen in its Chuckwagon Cafe, because it can't afford the $10,000 to $20,000 needed to bring it up to restaurant standards.

Cowtown has struggled to draw visitors and maintain buildings, and a consultant's study in March 2006 recommended either selling the museum or spending $5 million to $16 million to preserve it. Board members voted to keep the attraction open but to slash its budget, most of which comes from Sedgwick County.

"The hardest thing as president is getting across to everyone it is a weird year and it is not going to be normal," said Jennifer Lee, Cowtown's board

Bob Garrett, Cowtown's interim director, said the museum can address all of its problems.

"For everything we are going through, we are still good, we are getting better," Garrett said. "I see the potential. I'm working with it every day."

But City Council member Sharon Fearey, who is a nonvoting board member, said tension still exists between the board and city and county governments because the board does not want to accept oversight from the city and county. After the museum fired its director last year, the city sent John D'Angelo, its director of arts and cultural services, to take charge of the museum's budget and strategic planning

"If I had to identify what ne tension is - money would be the big issue," Fearey said. "1 don't think the board is accepting the help the city and county, through John D'Angelo, want to give them."

Manhattan woman victim of hit-and-run

By Leann Sulzen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan woman was listed in critical but stable condition Monday afternoon following a hitand-run accident Sunday.

Neola Bruns, 77, 1315 Hudson St., was working in her front yard at about 3:30 p.m. Sunday when she was struck by a red pickup that left the roadway as it was traveling north on Hudson Avenue, according to a news release from the Riley County Police Department.

The truck then left the area northbound on Hudson. The driver has not been identified.

Bruns was flown to the Nebraska Medical Center in Omaha, Neb., where she is being treated for a major head injury, a collapsed lung and a broken arm, said Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD

The RCPD is investigating the accident and asks that those with information regarding the red truck or the identity of the driver contact them at (785) 527-2112 or the Crime Stoppers Hotline at (785) 539-7777.

Officers arrest local suspect in theft attempt

By Leann Sulzen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Investigative work by the patrol division at the Riley County Police Department led to the arrest of a suspect who allegedly attempted to rob two Manhattan businesses Friday afternoon.

Dominic Dillard, 42, 922 Riley Lane, was arrested at his home at about 5 p.m. Friday for two counts of attempted robbery.

Officers received a call at about 3 p.m. that said someone had just tried to rob Enlow Sales, 409 Fair Lane. Before an officer arrived at the business, a similar call came in from Affordable Transportation Company, 701 Fort Riley Blvd., said Lt. Michael Quintanar.

The suspect went into both businesses and demanded money while keeping his hand in his pocket, Quintanar said. When both businesses refused, the sus-

The first officer who arrived on the scene saw a suspect that matched the description and a pursuit followed. The suspect was lost in the 900 block of Riley Lane

However, one of the patrol officers had dealt with someone earlier in the week who matched the suspect's description and offered the address that led to Dillard's arrest, Quintanar said. "It's good investigative work on the part of our patrol division," Quintanar said.

Dillard was released on a $40,000 bond.

Originally, fliers advertised that the event was to take place in Bosco Student Plaza outside K-State Student Union.

Sleeper said the Union Program Council initially planned to help sponsor the event but pulled its support recently because of conflicting issues. He said they pulled down all the campus flyers and promotions.

The event will feature the Afters, a band from the MTV series "8th and Ocean," as well as bands Mainstay and Our Hearts Hero.

Sleeper said people can buy tickets in advance for $7.50 without a T-shirt or $10 with a T-shirt at a booth next to the Union food court. They also can buy tickets for $10 at the event.

Spring fever a cause for distraction, allergies among students, teachers

By Elise Podhajsky KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All across campus, students can feel the effects - both physically and mentally warm weather brings.

For some, spring fever means getting outside and consequently forgetting about school or work. For allergy sufferers, it means an inevitable runny nose and fear of all things in bloom. Either way, there is no doubt the tsunami that is spring fever has crashed onto the K-State campus leaving almost no survivors.

Chrissy Stecich, sophomore in bakery science and management, said ever since the ice melted and the temperature rose, she has found it increasingly difficult to pay attention in class.

"I do lots of staring out the window, lots of watching the clock and lots of not paying attention - ever - so my grades are amazing," she said.

Stecich said she attributes her distraction to the warm weather and the increase of people participating in outdoor activities while she is in class.

"School just needs to be over," she Nasrina Evenstar, women's studies instructor and graduate student in English, said she notices a sudden change in her students' ability to stay focused after

"More side conversations come up instead of people focusing on the main discussion," she said. "You can tell by the look on (students') faces that it's a lot harder for them to stay engaged."

Evenstar also said she sees more late assignments and a general dip in attendance post-spring break, but students are not the only ones sucked in by spring fe-

"I think teachers get every bit as restless and burned out and tired," she said. "We want to go outside and enjoy the weather just as much as everybody else."

So is spring fever an actual condition? K-State counselor Melissa Todd said she does not believe so. She said University Counseling Services does not acknowledge spring fever and that people have natural tendencies to become more restless and eager to get outside after the "winter blahs."

When the days become longer in the spring, Todd said the increase of sunlight can improve people's moods, which often results in distraction.

"I think that it's natural for people to be distracted when the weather gets nice," she said. "People have less of a desire to be in buildings, and things like that are pretty intuitive. When the days are longer and there's more sunlight, they want to do more things they couldn't do in the win-

Although Todd considers spring fever to be a natural behavioral reaction to the changing weather, spring fever used to be a serious and often fatal condition during the 18th century.

According to erworld.com, spring fever was an affliction that struck many people after long winters when fresh fruits and vegetables were not available. The illness, now known as scurvy, caused weakness with joint swelling, loose teeth and poor healing of wounds.

The saying, "An apple a day keeps the doctor away" came from the time when 18th-century doctors would prescribe apples to patients with scurvy. Though they didn't know how or why, the doctors found apples to help spring fever patients. Doctors now know scurvy is caused by a lack of vitamin C, a vitamin found in

Also known as Pesah, Passover celebrates the birth of the Jewish na-

"This is when the people became a religion, not just a bunch of nomads," said Sheldon Edelman, member of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation.

Although Manhattan does not have a traditional Jewish temple or rabbi, nearly fifty Jews gathered at the Manhattan Jewish Congregation to celebrate a community Seder meal last night. It will mark the congregation's 38th consecutive Passover Seder.

"For a small group in a small town, it's pretty good," Edelman said.

The Passover is one of the most important holidays on the Jewish calendar, second only to the Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur. According to Edelman, Passover's importance touches many facets of Jewish life. He noted that it was the event that began the observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, as well as the founding of the Torah, the doctrine of Jewish

Professor's book classifies Flint Hills plants

By Ben Hedges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The average person walking through the vast Flint Hills might wish for a guide to learn more about the wildflowers and grasses of the area.

A member of the K-State faculty has created such a guide, which has become a respected source for anyone wanting to know more about plant life in Kansas.

Michael Haddock, chair of the sciences department for Kansas State University Libraries, is the author of "Wildflowers and Grasses of Kansas: A Field Guide," a comprehensive guide documenting more than 250 different wildflowers and more than 50 different grasses across Kansas.

Published in 2005 by the University Press of Kansas, the guide features high-resolution digital photos and an explanation of each plant Haddock has documented through his many years of research.

"This is the first book to come out on Kansas plants in about 24 or 25 years," Haddock said. "And it's the first one on Kansas plants that includes grasses."

The book has received much praise from colleagues and last year was selected as a "2006 Kansas Notable Book" by the Kansas Center for the Book at the State Library of Kansas. Most recently, Haddock's book was used as a source for a feature article on the Flint Hills in National Geographic Magazine. "I thought it was a real nice article," Haddock said. "It's good that they are letting the rest of the world know about the Flint Hills and the important natural resource we have Haddock's love for plant life stemmed from his childhood when his father, who also had great interest in plants, introduced him to a plant American Indians used as a painkiller.

"He cleaned off the root of this thing and had me chew on it and my entire mouth went numb, like when you go to the dentist," Haddock said

Haddock began documenting Kansas plant life when he created a Web site in 1996 featuring photographs he had taken over the years of wildflowers and different harvests.

He said he got the idea for a book when a colleague complimented him on the quality of his Web site.

"He said to me, 'Mike, I view your Web site all the time to help identify stuff, and it's wonderful, but I can't take it with me. Why don't you do a book?"" Haddock said with a laugh.

The research done for his book has been the culmination of more than a decade's worth of work

The photos Haddock used in his book come not only from the Flint Hills but also from the entire state of Kan-

Craig Freeman, a professor and curator of the R.L. Mc-Gregor Herbarium at the University of Kansas, has known Haddock for several years and helped him assemble the

"It was good to see someone else finally publishing a book on the wildflowers and grasses of the state," Freeman

Freeman believes the book is useful to people with both an extensive and limited knowledge of plant life.

He also said it was important that grasses were included in the book since they are usually hard to document and photograph.

"Mike has a good eye for things in plants that need to be highlighted," Freeman said. "And he had made the book into an easy-to-use fashion."

Haddock hopes to write another edition of his book or even another volume, since he has around 200 more plants to document.

"It all just depends on what the publisher wants to do," Haddock said.

Haddock continues to update his Web site, www.lib. ksu.edu/wildflower, which features more than 1,000 photos of the diverse plant life in

Commission likely to authorize condemnation

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

· The city commission likely will vote to use eminent domain for the south redevelopment project at its meeting tonight in City Hall.

The commission will vote on the second reading of an ordinance that would authorize the city to use condemnation to acquire seven of the 23 properties in the redevelopment. Dial Realty has reached agreements to acquire the other 16 properties, according to city staff. City officials have said repeatedly the condemnation process is not absolute and can end any time a property owner wants to negotiate an agreement to sell. Ten properties were originally at risk of condemnation when the commission started work on this legislation, but agreements have been reached Eminent domain comes from the last provision of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which reads, "... nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that using eminent domain to take land for economic development is not unconstitutional.

The city had planned on taking much more time before making these decisions, but a law passed by the Kansas Legislature last year forced its hand. The law ends the city's ability to use eminent domain to buy property for economic development purposes on July 1.

Property acquisition and planning for the south redevelopment project have been sped up because of the deadline. The commission voted on a resolution declaring condemnation necessary on March 15 and approved the first reading of this ordinance last week.

The commissioners have stressed they hoped to avoid using eminent domain but were illing to use it as a last re-They voted to use it on two property owners in the north redevelopment project last year.

Meetings where the project and condemnation came up attracted large audiences last month. Several of the property owners who are holding out spoke at the meetings and said they needed more than they were being offered.

Mike Conkwright, manager of Bud's Auto Service, 301 Colorado St., delivered a slide presentation to the commission March 15 that detailed his family's business and its assets. He said he would have to replace all of it if he was forced out by the redevelopment, but Dial hasn't offered him enough to pay for the relocation.

"We are holding out for our way of life," Conkwright said at the meeting. "Our livelihood is

The commission also will discuss the implementation of relocation benefits for tenants living in the south redevelop-

Residents in the south projefits in return for having to move to make room for the redevelopment. The bonds to pay for these benefits are projected to be issued in May or June, according to city staff, but some of the soon-to-be-displaced residents have asked for the money earlier so they can move soon-

The commission will consider taking some money from the downtown redevelopment fund to give to residents who are relocating or going out of business from the south project area, according to city staff. The money from the fund would be reimbursed once the bonds are issued.

Also up for consideration at tonight's meeting is a bond ordinance worth $29 million for the Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community.

The commission approved a resolution of intent in November to issue up to $55 million in Health Care Facility Revenue Bonds for Meadowlark Hills, according to city staff. The community has been issued slightly more than $25 million so

If approved, the commission would vote on the second reading of this second round of bonds on April 17, according to city staff.

Can't hear you now

It is unnecessary for children to own cellular phones

My cell phone and I will celebrate our two-year anniversary this month.

No, your eyes are not failing you. I earned my first cell phone in 2005, at the venerable age of 19. I said I "earned" the cell phone, because it was something I acquired for my new position as a reporter at the Collegian. I did not get the phone for social or safety reasons, although it has come in handy for both.

At 19, I was ready for a cell phone, even though many of my peers received their first phones in high school.

I must admit I am not financially accountable for my phone because of a family plan, but it still is a significant responsibility. So I was shocked after reading a March 29 report in The New York Times quoting the mother of a 9year-old girl who received a cell phone as a reward for not being mean to her little sister for 30 days.

Children do not have the necessary responsibility skills to handle a cell phone at age 9. At age 9, my biggest obligation was making sure my class-picture money got to school safely from its envelope in my backpack.

Yankee Group, a technology consulting firm in Boston, estimates there will be 10.5 million preteen cell phone users by 2010, according to The Times' report. The report also parallels the decision age of getting one's ears pierced with the age when one should get a cell

I got my ears pierced for the first time when I was 12. The amount of responsibility and maturity that comes with ear-piercing is not parallel to owning a cell phone. Earpiercing is a chore that requires care for about six weeks; taking care of a cell phone is an evolving contract of monthly bills, managing minute-plans and, oh yeah, not losing

According to The Times' report, cell phones serve as status symbols and electronic security blankets for households with split-custody arrangements and two-career households. Parents in the report claimed their child's cell phone was an emergency back-up system.

the device.

Historically, parents went thousands of years without cell phones and managed to raise their children safely without such a "back-up system." Oh, but Mom! I have to have a cell phone because all of my friends' parents let them have one.

Children must learn - at an early age - that they must earn luxuries, and their friends having a technological toy does not offer enough reason for them to have the same

In a material-driven society, let's redefine the boundaries of age-appropriateness when it comes to technological gadgets. Instead of granting a $100 "toy" - with additional monthly bills, remember - when children behave well for a month, let's reward them with positive reinforcement and something that breaks less bank, like a new T-shirt or an ice-cream cone.

Oh, and do not depend endlessly on something the size of your palm, that has restricted minutes and ranges, as a safety scapegoat.

Gambling, if handled correctly, could provide much-needed additional funding for Kansas

Gambling is an effective means of bringing in state funding.

But in permitting gambling outside of semiautonomous American Indian reservations, the state and individual cities must take care that this tool is applied appropriately.

Primarily, we have good reason to worry about the effects casinos have on the surrounding areas.

A study published by the University of Georgia, "Casinos and Crime," concluded that counties housing casinos have a violent crime average 8 percent higher than counties without casinos.

While casinos do present other benefits to their home areas in the form of employment and revenue from local sales taxes, the study also argued that the crime risks casinos invite may outweigh any redeeming qualities.

However, we believe that casinos, if properly placed and patrolled, can be a benefit to the state.

City governments, working in tandem with Topeka and casino managers, should coordinate regarding proper policing and zoning of the surrounding areas to prevent the emergence of a criminal element or an endless slew of grimy pawn shops.

Extra care from legislators can negate the possibility of this occurring.

By proceeding carefully through this process, the state can secure a healthy addition to its funding, and given our current library of underfunded backlogs, every single cent helps.

Though pejoratively referred to as a tax upon the stupid, legalized gambling, if done correctly, could provide a much needed boost to our state's finances.

Easter events from 2007 perspective

Sunday, while sitting in Catholic mass, I started thinking about the death of Jesus, and wondered how events would transpire if the crucifixion was to occur today.

Our culture has become so concerned with political correctness, the trial and conviction of Jesus would be a much longer gospel story. This is the passion of Jesus with a 2007 twist.

KING

During the Passover meal, Jesus and his disciples eat and drink together. Jesus says to the Twelve that one of them is going to betray him to the American Civil Liberties Union. One by one the Disciples ask, "Is it me?" Jesus looks at each one and says,

"No, it isn't you." Finally, Judas asks, "Is it I, Jesus?" With thick, blatant Jewish sarcasm, Jesus responds, "Is it me, Jesus?" Knowing he is no longer welcome, Judas runs down the block to the office of Janet Reno. Judas has been a rat for the ACLU for many years, . working to undermine Jesus' teaching in the public sector. With the offer of fame and protection, Reno convinces Judas to give up Jesus' location.

While Jesus prays in a garden, Reno assembles the largest anti-religious fighting force the world has ever seen. ACLU attorneys and agents from the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives swarm the garden as if it was Waco

After the garden is set ablaze by a "tear gas container," Jesus quickly is arrested and extradited to San Francisco for prosecution.

For this special case, the ACLU brings in its favorite prosecutors, Ronnie Earl and Patrick Fitzgerald. These saints of the left are famous for the prosecution of former senator Tom Delay, R-Texas, and former chief of staff to the vice president, Scooter

After seven grand juries, the charges of conspiracy to commit conspiracy, obstruction of justice and identify theft - claiming to be the son of God - are the only ones the prosecution can make stick.

Just like Lazarus, Jesus brings defense lawyer Johnnie Cochran back from the dead. Working for hours each day, Cochran makes the defensive stand of, "If the crown does not fit, you must acquit."

Jesus is found guilty, and quickly appeals to the high priests. In this story it is none other than 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, the most anti-religious court of law in the country.

In the court opinion, the circuit court says, "We believe God or His son have no place in the United

We can not allow you to continue to speak on behalf of Judeo-Christian values." The verdict is upheld, and Jesus is scheduled to be put to death in seven to 10 years.

Jesus spends the next few years in a cell with Scott Peterson, creating license plates at a pace no one has ever

Other inmates make statements like, "Jesus Christ, you're fast." Jesus smiles and says, "Why yes, I

When the day finally arrives for Jesus to be put to death, the government does not crucify him on a cross, which would be considered cruel and unusual punishment.

Instead of the crucifix, the Christian symbol for Jesus is a lethal injection table, because it is a much more humane way to die.

This story was intended to push the limits, be humorous and show the craziness of our society.

The Easter season is not about bunnies and chocolate eggs. Remember that this weekend.

2 OF 40 BOATS ELIGIBLE TO PARTICIPATE IN UPCOMING SEAL HUNT

TORONTO - Canada's controversial annual seal hunt opened Monday in the southern Gulf of St. Lawrence, where the worst ice conditions in more than two decades nearly have wiped out the herd there.

Fisheries officials said the scarcity of seals in the area led to only two of 40 eligible boats participating in the start of the traditional spring hunt that is important to the livelihood of Canadian seal hunters and aboriginal peoples.

The total quota for this year's seal hunt is 270,000 animals. That is 65,000 fewer than last year, a change made mainly because of the toll from the ice conditions. The seal population in Canada now stands at about 5.5 million.

About 70 percent of the seals sought in Canadian waters will be taken in the third stage of the hunt off northern Newfoundland. An opening date has yet to be announced.

ABOUT 150 PEOPLE KILLED BY AVALANCHES, FLOODS IN CENTRAL ASIA

KABUL, Afghanistan – Avalanches and floods triggered by heavy rains and spring snow melt have killed about 150 people in recent days in the mountains of central Asia, officials said Monday.

In Afghanistan, the death totals reached 88 on Monday, and officials said more than half the country's provinces had flooded, said the Ministry of Rural Rehabilitation and Development.

The government has distributed tents, blankets and sandbags to people, but aid agencies still were trying to reach an estimated 20,000-25,000 people in remote areas, said Aleem Siddique, spokesman for the U.N. Assistance Mission in Afghanistan.

Meanwhile, flooding and avalanches have killed more than 50 people in the past 10 days in northwestern Pakistan, near the border with Afghanistan.

SOUTH KOREA, U.S. REACH FREE-TRADE AGREEMENT, BIGGEST DEAL SINCE 1993

SEOUL, South Korea – The United States reached its biggest free trade agreement since NAFTA on Monday, clinching a last-minute deal with close security ally South Korea that it hopes will bolster bilateral ties and provide added spark to the Doha Round of global trade talks.

The deal, which requires approval by lawmakers in both countries, is the biggest for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement signed in 1993, and is expected to lead to more than 90 percent of U.S. exports to South Korea being duty free within three years.

It is the biggest trade deal ever for South Korea, which in nearly 50 years has grown from one of the world's poorest countries to become its 10th-largest economy.

TSUNAMI HITS VILLAGES IN SOLOMON ISLANDS, KILLS AT LEAST 13

HONIARA, Solomon Islands – Bodies floated out to sea and thousands of residents camped out overnight Tuesday on a hillside above a devastated town in the western Solomon Islands after a tsunami that struck without warning washed away coastal villages, killing at least 13 people. Death totals were expected to rise.

A wall of water reportedly 30 feet high struck the island of Choiseul and swept a third of a mile inland, while smaller but still destructive waves surged ashore elsewhere in the western part of the impoverished archipelago, causing widespread damage and leaving thousands homeless.

The quake – the strongest in the Solomons in more than three decades – set off tsu nami alarms from Tokyo to Hawaii.

BENEDICT SAYS HE HEARS VOICE OF JOHN PAUL IN COMMUNION OF SAINTS

VATICAN CITY – Pope Benedict XVI said Monday he already can hear the voice of John Paul II among the saints, indicating on the second anniversary of his predecessor's death that he too was fully in favor of canonization.

Benedict spoke during an open-air Mass in St. Peter's Square in honor of John Paul hours after Roman Catholic officials formally closed their investigation into his life and virtues — a milestone in the process of elevating the late pontiff to sainthood.

"In the communion of saints, it seems we can hear the living voice of our beloved John Paul II, who from the house of his father, we are sure, continues to accompany the Church," Benedict said.

PELOSI SAYS WHITE HOUSE SINGLING OUT HER VISIT AFTER REPUBLICANS'TRIP

BEIRUT, Lebanon – House Speaker Nancy Pelosi on Monday shrugged off White House criticism of her impending visit to Damascus, saying she had "great hope" for reviving U.S. relations with Syria and changing its behavior.

Speaking hours after arriving in Lebanon, Pelosi indicated the Bush administration was singling out her trip to Syria while ignoring recent visits by Republican members of Congress.

"It's interesting because three of our colleagues, who are all Republicans, were in Syria yesterday and I didn't hear the White House speaking out about that," Pelosi said, referring to the Sunday meeting of Reps. Frank Wolf, Joe Pitts and Robert Aderholt with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus.

In Washington, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino stressed Monday that the Bush administration objected to all visits to Syria.

"We ask that people not go on these trips," she said. "We discourage it. Full stop."

Senate passes bill to expand gambling, bring in revenue

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Senate narrowl passed a bill March 29 that will expand gambling zones in Kansas.

The law will allow the introduction of 2,200 slot machines at three Kansas racetracks. The machines will be distributed evenly between Wichita Greyhound Park, the Woodlands in Kansas City and Camptown in Frontenac.

The bill also allows "tourist-attracting" casinos in Sedgwick, Sumner, Wyandotte, Crawford, Cherokee and Ford Counties, according to The Associated Press.

The Senate passed the bill by a narrow 21-19 vote, signaling the end of a 15-year effort by gambling promoters, according to The AP.

The bill, which still awaits Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' signature, has met some hesitation. However, the bill provides benefits for the three Kansas racetracks and their surrounding communities.

Jayme LaRocca, general manager of the Woodlands, said the bill single-handedly saved the racetrack.

"We have been losing $1-2 million a year, and we were afraid that we would have to close down," LaRocca said.

She said the bill saved 250-300 jobs and should create thousands more, in turn helping the area's economy.

The bill also will send slot machines to the racetrack in Frontenac. Dan Brunetti, Frontenac city manager, said the bill will help his town.

"We are a border town," Brunetti said. "A lot of people will go to the Indian casinos in Oklahoma, and they take their money with them."

Brunetti also said the addition of the machines could raise the city's annual budget from $2.5 million to $3 million.

Others in the state do not share the same feelings about the bill. Ben Davis, junior in political science and history, said the bill sets a bad precedent for the state and will hurt Kansas families.

"If you draw a 50-mile radius around areas that get casinos, the suicide rate goes up, the divorce rate goes up, and the bankruptcy rate goes up," Davis said. "Kansas does not need casinos."

Students get in shape during class with running, basketball electives

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jogging around the track for 30 minutes. Scrimmaging up and down the basketball court for 50 minutes. These activities are taking place not only at Peters Recreation Complex but also right here on campus as part of one-credit classes.

Tom Barstow, head of the Department of Kinesiology, said 100-level classes like jogging, weightlifting and aerobic dancing are not required for kinesiology students, but they can serve as electives.

"We encourage them to be active, but they're not required," he said. "Typically what students would do is take one class a semester, but they may often take two or three over the course of different semesters, depending on their interest."

Barstow said the classes are lifetime sport and activity classes, which he said describes the department's intention for offering them.

"It gives students the opportunity to know what activities they could be doing throughout their life, and it's a way not only to provide activity but instruction in the best way to do those activities," he said. "We would like to see every student on campus participate in these classes."

He said the classes give students practical experience about how to put together a workout program.

"It is also the goal to educate them about the value of these activities in their life from a health point of view," Barstow said.

Kelli Trecek, junior in kinesiology, said she has taken a jogging course, KIN 162, and a basketball course, KIN 120, as electives while at K-State. Trecek said she is one of four girls in her basketball class this semester, and she enjoys scrimmaging with the people in her class.

"Basically, it's really fun because we get to play five-onfive everyday," she said.

Trecek said she also took a jogging class in fall 2006 because she wanted to stay in shape.

She said the class helped her learn the basic techniques of jogging, and she said by knowing the techniques, she will be able to better promote physical exercise to patients when she is a chiropractor.

"If I know how to do it myself, then I can show other people how," she said.

Though most of her classes involved playing basketball or jogging, Trecek said she also took quizzes over the information taught.

Barstow said the classes are not reserved solely for kinesiology majors.

Katie Johnston, sophomore in elementary education, is taking the jogging class this semester.

"I didn't have a full load this semester, and my roommate was taking it," she said, "so I thought it would be fun to take it with her and get in shape."

Johnston said she has not learned anything new about running, but she feels motivated to exercise on a regular basis now that she has to for a class.

Amanda Richards, senior in theater, said she is taking both the jogging class and a weightlifting class this semester.

Richards said she decided to enroll in the courses because she has a busy schedule, and it can be hard for her to stick to a workout routine when she gets busy.

"I knew this would make me stick with it because I'm getting a grade," she said.

Richards said one part about the class that bothered her was that she had to pay for it, like any other class.

"It makes me feel weird because I could go to the rec for free," she said.

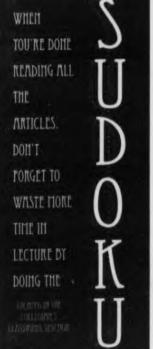

She said the classes are different from the rest of her semester schedule because though there is not any homework, the work is demanding physically.

A similarity between the classes and the rest of her schedule is the progress made, she said.

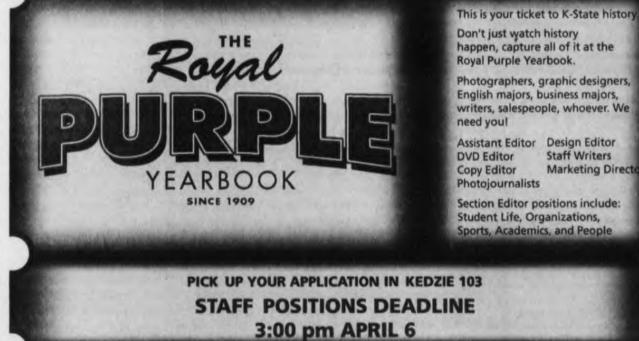

"I'll be more in shape and maybe a bit thinner," she said, "but other classes and electives have papers and projects to show progress and accomplishment at the end of the semester."

Barstow said the instructors of the lifetime-sport and activity classes are graduate teaching assistants within the kinesiology department.

"They all have background training in physiology of exercise, and most of them participate in those activities themselves," he said.

Prince, K-State show no fear in scheduling

Spring practice already is underway for K-State football, yet all some fans want to talk about is coach Ron Prince's scheduling philosophy.

They don't think it's smart to play "bold and daring" with the non-conference schedule, they don't think playing some of the nation's elite programs is a good way to rebuild, and apparently, they don't believe in challenges. If only they'd just shut up.

Normally I wouldn't say that, but Prince's situation is different than most. Why? Because "bold and daring" - if it doesn't work out - could eventually cost him his job.

But give Prince credit. He is more concerned with the interests of the team than his own well-being.

He easily could have scheduled four cupcake non-conference games from now until it's time to renew his contract, and all he'd need is a few wins in Big 12 Conference play each year to earn a bowl berth and make everybody happy (for the record, that's the approach Kansas coach Mark Mangino tries to employ).

Of course, Prince is not following the path once taken by former coach Bill Snyder, who often used an easy schedule to pave the way toward bowl eligibility. But Prince, unlike Mangino, is smart enough to realize he's not Bill Snyder, and few people are. Sink or swim, he's got to do it his way

Prince believes in playing against good competition and thinks it'll be the fastest way for K-State's program to return to prominence. That's why he's comfortable with going on the road to take on Southeastern Conference power Auburn in the 2007 season opener, and why he's already stocked the fridge with games against tradition-rich programs for the future. In today's game, he said he believes in order to be the best, you've got to play the best.

"I want to be challenged," Prince said. "I'm one of those people that say, 'Well, what if we win?"

Too many coaches worry too much about, "Well what if we lose?" And that, more than anything, is why non-conference college football games are terrible. There are only about eight to 10 marquee non-conference games each year, because most coaches are terrified of entering conference play with a loss.

Not Prince, who said his team wouldn't have had a chance at upsetting Texas last season if not for its 24-6 home loss against Louisville earlier in the year. The Louisville game, Prince said, was a measuring stick for his players. It taught them how good they had to be in order to play at the game's top level.

"We were able to go back and say, 'OK, if we want to play well against this kind of team in the future, these are the kinds of things we're going to need to do," Prince said.

This season, K-State will find out early on what it needs to do. And in the process, the Wildcats will benefit from a national TV appearance and the added exposure that goes with it. The same can't be said for teams that spend their time hiding behind a soft non-conference schedule.

"We just think it's exciting," Prince said of K-State's schedule, with a smirk on his face the size of the Superdome, site of the 2008 BCS Championship game in New That's his goal, to compete for a championship.

Playing a loaded schedule might not be the best way to get there. Countless teams have proven there's an easier path to the title game. But for Prince and the Wildcats, it will be the only way, as "bold and daring" as it might sound.

K-State's Eddie Vasquez lays down a sacrifice bunt during K-State's game against Texas Tech Sunday. K-State will play Kansas at 7 tonight at Tointon Family Stadium.

Contrasting styles of Kansas, K-State to collide tonight

By Dayne Logan KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team continues its nine-game homestand at 7 tonight when the Wildcats face instate rival Kansas at Tointon Family Stadium.

The Jayhawks (16-17, 3-6 Big 12 Conference) have had a rough start to the season but will look to right the ship with a win over the Wildcats (20-8, 3-3 Big 12).

K-State also has had its share of trouble lately, dropping four of its last seven games. However, the Wildcats did manage to take two of three from Texas Tech over the weekend and are 10-2 at home this Much like their records, the teams' playing styles are noticeably different. At the plate, Kansas is known for its ability to hit the long ball. The Jayhawks have hit 29 home runs this season, led by junior Ryne Price's seven homers. "(The Jayhawks) like swinging the bats. They've obviously been very good in that category," coach Brad Hill said.

Conversely, K-State is a team that likes to play small ball and gets runs by moving runners with bunts and playing strategic baseball. This is evidenced by the team's ability to win despite hitting just nine home runs this season.

"You have to play to your strengths," Hill said. "Our kids have adapted pretty well to that and understand what we need to do to be successful. That is trying to get bunts down, running the bases very smart, hitting the ball really flat, and just trying not to do too much."

The pitcher's mound is another place where the teams differ. Whereas Kansas tends to live and die by the performances of its starters, who have 24 of the team's 33 decisions this season, K-State's bullpen has been the deciding factor in most of its games, accounting for more than half of the team's deci-

"(The relievers) have been crucial for our success," Hill said. "All the guys have had moments where they've come in and been put in the spotlight and made good pitches. If we can get a starter to get us to the fifth or sixth and the game's right there, we feel pretty good about our chances of winning."

Tonight's starter for the Wildcats will be sophomore Todd Vogel. Vogel has made eight appearances this season, including two starts, and has an ERA of just 2.89.

Sharing the mound with Vogel will be Kansas' Andres Esquibel, who is 4-2 on the year with a 4.93

Cheer squad to return to nationals

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before last year's appearance at the National Cheerleaders Association competition, the K-State cheerleaders had not been to Florida for the competition in 11 years.

"We were the first squad that had gone down there in a decade," said Kendall Lange, who has been a cheerleader for three years. "We're really breaking new grounds for the future of the program."

K-State will send both an all-women cheer squad and a co-ed squad to nationals, which are in Daytona, Fla. In last year's competition, K-State's all-women team finished eighth, while the co-ed team finished in seventh place overall.

Of her experience last year, Lange, a senior in public relations and speech communication, said she had been excited to cheer at a venue other than

"It gives us a chance to show that we can do things aside from cheering at the games," she said. "Some people think that cheerleaders are just the girls that they see down at the end of the field at football games. This really solidifies us as a sport at a national

James Bowen, a yell leader who also competed on the co-ed team last year, said he did not know what to expect from last year's competition.

"It wasn't what I thought it would be like," he said. "It was in Daytona on the beach, but the first day was inside. It was like a normal competition, but everyone was waiting for the finals and the chance to perform outside."

performing, Bowen, a sophomore in theater, said he and the other K-State cheerleaders have the opportunity to meet people from different parts of the country.

"You meet people from a lot of different squads," he said. "Finals are on Friday, so on Saturday there's a chance to meet with different squads and have a blast. At night, they also have social things for us to do."

However, Bowen said, he is mostly looking forward to competing and showing how far K-State cheerleading has come in the last year.

"I'm really excited about showing off our routine," he said. "This year, we have better skills. This year, our goal is to get a top-5 ranking, especially in Division 1-A. We have a huge opportunity to go down there and show off and really do well."

Vince Garver, a first-year yell-leader, said he was "happy and surprised" when he found out K-State would be making the trip.

"The opportunity to compete in a competition bigger than any highschool competition is exciting," said Garver, freshman in business admin-

The best part about cheerleading, Garver said, is the general attitude of all the people.

"Everyone wants to do well and we can feed off of their work ethic, and it helps to make you a better person in general," he said.

The all-women team will compete Thursday at 10:38 a.m., and the coed team will compete Thursday at 1:30 p.m. K-State is one of only four universities to have both teams represented at nationals.

BBO | Tribune says it plans to sell Cubs after 2007 season

CHICAGO — Tribune Co. made a stunning pitch to investors on baseball's opening day: the Chicago Cubs will be sold at season's end.

The announcement came Monday as the ailing media conglomerate announced its acquisition by billionaire investor Sam Zell. It puts one of sports' most storied and star-crossed franchises on the block, a year shy of the 100th anniversary of its last World Series title.

Zell, a real estate magnate who already owns part of his hometown Bulls and White Sox, issued no comment about why he's not interested in keeping the Cubs in connection with the $8.2 billion deal. The team is one of Tribune's richest assets.

Bidding for the ballclub and historic Wrigley Field, however, is certain to be fiercely competitive. Analysts have estimated the Cubs could fetch $600 million or more, a far cry from the $20.5 million Tribune paid in 1981.

While the total might not exceed the record $660 million paid for the Boston Red Sox in 2002, analysts and baseball insiders all agreed the price should top those paid since then for the Washington Nationals ($450 million), Los Angeles Dodgers ($430 million) and Milwaukee Brewers ($223 million), and agreed to for the Atlanta Braves ($461 million).

Suffering without rest

Sleep disorders trouble millions of Americans, can be prevented with lifestyle changes

By Kendra Stiles KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the United States, an estimated 55 million people have trouble sleeping or have some sort of sleep disorder. cardiopulmonary experts at Manhattan's Mercy Regional Health Center said.

SLEEP APNEA

More than 80 different sleep disorders exist, but obstructive sleep apnea syndrome is the most common. The word 'apnea' is Greek for "without breath," according to the American Sleep Apnea Association's Web site. Obstructive sleep apnea syndrome is a disorder caused by the narrowing of the opening in the back of the throat, said Don Hedden, cardiopulmonary director at Mercy Regional.

"Obstructive sleep apnea occurs when you have brief periods of time where you stop breathing at night," he said. "It happens because the air passage at the back of the throat is partially blocked."

When the air passage is obstructed, the brain senses an extra effort to breathe, and this disruption causes the person to wake up. After waking, the person's air passage clears, taking the extra stress off the brain, which leads to the person quickly falling back to sleep, Hedden said. This disorderly cycle can occur hundreds of times in one night, but it is uncommon for the person to remember any of it.

Hedden said the muscles in the throat naturally relax when we sleep, and it is normal for the air passage to narrow. However, it is a cause for concern when the obstruction is so severe a person stops breathing during the night. "The main cause for concern with sleep apnea is not that it keeps a person from sleeping the whole night through," he said. "It causes harm to other parts of your body, so that's why it's important to get it treated."

Diana Fritz, registered respiratory therapist and sleep technologist at the Mercy Regional sleep lab, said sleep apnea keeps a person from getting enough deep sleep. The rapid eye movement phase and stages three and four of the sleep cycle are when we get deep sleep, and those with sleep apnea get little to none

"We typically spend 50 percent of the night in stage two of the sleep cycle," she said. "Twenty-five percent of the night should be spent in the REM stage and 20 percent should be spent in stages three and four. However, those who have sleep apnea get hardly any, and that's why they're so tired during the day."

Fritz said more than 1,500 fatalities per year and 100,000 accidents per year occur because of sleep apnea and other sleep disorders. Twentyfour hours without sleep is equivalent to a blood alcohol level of 0.93.

"There was recently a court case in Salina where a truck driver had sleep apnea but stopped his treatment," Hedden said. "He fell asleep while and killed a mother and her 10-month-old baby. He's now facing charges for manslaugh-

Fritz said untreated sleep apnea can cause several severe health problems, including high blood pressure, heart attack, stroke and depression. The main effect of sleep apnea is loss of oxygen to the brain, which causes the heart to work harder. The heart tries to compensate for the lower level of oxygen, and in turn, it puts itself under extra stress, which leads to more severe medical conditions. Sleep apnea also has been linked to diabetes and attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder in children.

NARCOLEPSY, INSOMNIA

Hedden said narcolepsy and insomnia are disorders most people are familiar with, but they are actually much less common than sleep apnea.

Insomnia is when someone has difficulty falling nd staying asleep, and narcolepsy is when one uncontrollably falls into deep sleep.

"Insomnia is a transient thing most of the time," he said. "It's usually self-limiting, and it resolves itself naturally. True cases of narcolepsy are almost rare, and the consequences are less significant except for the person with the disorder."

Insomnia and narcolepsy also have less of an effect on the rest of the body, Hedden said, and most of the cases they treat in the sleep lab are people with sleep apnea. Both driving, crossed the median disorders are less of a cause for concern for doctors than apnea because of the dangers apnea can cause for others as well as the person with the disorder.

Those who do not have sleep apnea often are affected in less traumatic ways. Fritz said snoring is often a tell-tale sign of sleep apnea, but not everyone who snores has the disorder.

"Snoring is not supposed to happen," she said. "It's not natural. A lot of times, a bed partner of the person who snores will be concerned and try to get that person to seek medical treatment. The soft tissue in the back of the throat collapses, and the tongue moves to the back, so sometimes snoring is just a result of

TREATMENT

Hedden said Mercy Regional's sleep lab usually treats 10 to 12 patients per week. Patients come in and stay for the night while lab technologists monitor their sleep.

Lab techs attach a series of sensors to the head and legs of patients and sensory belts across their chests.

The sensors feed information about brain activity, eye movement, heart rate, muscle tone, oxygen level and the breathing rate into a polysomnograph, which records everything for lab techs to examine.

Patients who appear to have sleep apnea are treated with a Continuous Positive Airway Pressure mask, which they wear when they go to bed. CPAP, as the treatment is called, helps open the back of the throat by feeding a steady stream of pressurized air through the nose.

"CPAP is the primary treatment we offer for patients who have sleep apnea," Fritz said. "Other options are surgery or an oral appliance from the dentist. It's a hard plastic mouthpiece, which pulls the lower jaw forward and causes the back of the throat to be

Fritz said sleep disorders have been a problem in the past, but people are more aware of them now than ever

The sleep-aid industry is growing rapidly, and prescription drugs such as Ambien and Lunesta are appearing all over the market.

"I think people are finding out that this really is a big problem," she said. "Until everybody hears about it, that's the way it's going to be. We're actually in the middle of a big marketing project right now."

However, Fritz said prescription drugs usually are not the answer for anyone who has a significant sleep disor-

"You have to sleep seven to eight hours for one of those drugs to work," she said. "If you sleep less than that, it will cause you to fall asleep later, because you'll still be tired. I've seen recent studies with some of the prescription sleep aids, and they actually cause more sleepwalking, talking, eating and driving."

Though millions of people have sleep disorders, Fritz and Hedden both said they usually can be prevented by exercising, eating right, practicing good "sleep hygiene" and staying healthy in general.

Hedden said middle-aged people are more likely to develop sleep disorders, so young people should take care of themselves now.

To practice good sleep hygiene, Hedden said people should avoid caffeine, alcohol and cigarettes before bed, try to stay on the same sleep schedule and turn bedtime preparations into a ritual. Obesity often leads to sleep apnea; therefore, exercising and eating right also are im-

"Most of the time, it's not a disorder," Hedden said. "It's what we do to ourselves. The way we take care of our bodies now will affect our health years down the road."

Staying on a consistent sleep schedule can be tough, especially for college students who often have to stay up late studying. However, Fritz said occasional breaks in the habit won't interfere too much. Daytime naps are OK for the most part, but sleeping too long encourages grogginess and the need for more sleep. Twenty-minute power naps are usually the best cure for afternoon sleepiness.

"You need to give your body what it wants, which is a long, consolidated sleep pattern," Hedden said, "or else you won't get the quality of sleep you'd get otherwise."

Both chambers advance measure to help families afford insurance

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA - Thousands of poor Kansans would get the state's help in paying for health insurance under a proposal endorsed Monday in both the House and Senate, as legislators moved closer to a modest package of health-care initiatives.

The proposal would create a new program eventually providing $77 million a year in benefits to about 24,000 adults by 2012. Supporters expect the state to spend about $3,200 per person.

The House approved, 117-5, a bill creating the new program. The Senate gave its own bill first-round approval on a voice vote and planned to take final action Tuesday. Both measures

Although the Democratic senator from Illinois said he was more than confident in his ability to lead the country, he said he needs people to help make the many changes he highlighted at his rally at Morningside College in Sioux City.

He spoke about many issues, including health care, education, the globalization of economy and the war in Iraq.

It was not the usual stageand-podium political rally. Obama stood in the middle of an auditorium and the audience sat around him.

He spent less than 10 minutes delivering an opening speech and spent more than an hour fielding questions from the audience.

The scene helped reinforce Obama's claims that his campaign - and potential presidency - is about listening to the priorities of the people.

Questions ranged from student apathy toward politics to

His opening speech focused on clarifying why he got involved in politics. As a former constitutional law professor at the University of Chicago and a Harvard Law graduate, Obama said he often is asked why he did not choose a more financially beneficial career.

Energy drinks could pose serious health risks, experts say

By Lior Bassell THE DARTMOUTH (DARTMOUTH)

HANOVER, N.H. - Writing a paper with no end in sight at the end of last winter trimester, freshman Allen Odeniyi turned for help to a popular campus study buddy: an energy drink. Odeniyi is not the only student to synthetically prolong work hours - as midterms and finals roll around each term, energy drinks become a fixture in libraries, lounges and residence hall rooms.

OUTSELLING COFFEE

Novack Cafe recently installed an entire cooler of RockStars to meet demand. Topside Convenience Store stocks and sells 29 different varieties of energy drinks. Compared to energy drinks, coffee products at Topside barely sell, Topside manager Tom Tattershall said.

Some students, on the other hand, are wary of energy drinks. During her freshman year, sophomore Jane Tucker was so awed by Topside's selection she attempted to try them all.

"My mini-fridge was constantly stocked with about five different types," she said. "I noticed that these drinks were packed with calories and really unappetizing-sounding artificial ingredients, and decided that I didn't want all that junk in my body. Since then I've stuck with coffee and the occasional sugar-free Red Bull."

Though energy drinks are popular, Lee Witters, professor or biology and medicine, said he is concerned about the consequences energy drinks have on students' health.

AFFECTING HEALTH

Energy drinks are highcaffeine, high-sugar mixtures combined with varying other chemicals to give the drinker an energy rush. Although the

of these chemicals have been investigated inconclusively, the caffeine in these drinks is the main source of their desired effect. Caffeine acts on the central nervous system as a stimulant, quickening vital processes or functional activity, improving attention and concentration as well as decreasing fatigue when taken in small doses.

The FDA does not regulate the caffeine levels in energy drinks, Witters said, nor are companies required to pass any type of product testing. The amount of caffeine in many energy drinks is more than what is necessary to obtain the positive effects of the

'Used in small doses, caffeine is positive in effect, and these drinks are not harmful," Witters said. "However, many of these drinks in general have way too much caffeine, and are working their way up the

The average amount of caffeine in an 8-ounce serving of brewed coffee, which is considered healthy, Witters said, is 135 milligrams. The caffeine in energy drinks ranges from 80 milligrams per 8 ounces of Red Bull to 33 milligrams per single ounce in the energy drink "Cocaine."

In such large doses as those found in "Cocaine," Witters said, caffeine can have damaging physical and psychological effects. Not only can this amount of caffeine drastically raise heart rates, but in people with hypertension and cardiac conditions - including conditions unbeknownst to caffeine drinkers - it also can lead to serious cardiac problems like heart palpitations. Too much caffeine also can lead to anxiety attacks, especially in people with underlying psychological disorders, he said.

BUILDING A TOLERANCE Some students, like sopho-

regularly drink at least three Red Bulls a day.

Surprisingly though, drinking more than one energy drink in a short amount of time can have the same effect as drinking one with a large caffeine content, Peck said.

"In general, the assumption is that more than 300 milligrams of caffeine per day can be problematic, interfering with sleep and causing dehydration. This can be fixed, but caffeine is addictive, so drinkers build up a tolerance, needing more and more caffeine for the same effect," she said.

Witters said a tolerant drinker might not become as anxious, but his or her heart still will be affected.

Although most students do not report side effects, many reported regularly consuming more than the prescribed dosage of caffeine, sometimes with bad results.

AVOIDING EMERGENCIES

Freshman Delia Gorman told the story of a friend who was rushed to the hospital because of heart palpitations after drinking a few cans of the energy drink Ball.

Ultimately, Witters said, the effects of energy drinks on the body, though certainly questionable, vary greatly depending on the amount of caffeine they contain and on the individual consuming them.

"It's very hard to make a general statement about energy drinks," he said. "There's no easy way to identify for whom this is a danger. Therefore, drinkers should always use caution and consume energy drinks - and caffeine - with moderation."

ENHANCING WORKOUTS

"These drinks are not a health concerns."

bad choice to study or stay up a little later, but they're definitely not a good choice as athletic enhancers," Witters said. "These drinks aren't Gatorade. They're not aimed at giving calories.'

Rather, they inject large amounts of caffeine to an already rapidly beating and heavily strained heart, he said, intensifying the effect of a workout.

There have been several reported deaths attributed to Sudden Adult Death Syndrome, a general term referring to an unexpected death in a healthy person, after drinking Red Bull and engaging in athletic activity.

Irish teen Ross Cooney drank several cans of Red Bull and then died on a basketball court during a game in 2001. Though these deaths have not been linked directly to Red Bull, the drink is suspect, Peck Red Bull did not return phone calls or an e-mail requesting comment.

After experiencing extreme hyperactivity and shaking, Odeniyi, who finished his paper and later was unable to sleep, vowed to stop drinking energy drinks.

"Energy drinks are terrible for your body," he said. "The long-term research that needs to be done hasn't been. I don't drink them anymore. It's not worth the toll on your body."

Some students' however, like Hiner-Leamon, continue to consume these beverages.

"If I spent my life worrying about absolutely everything that is not healthy, I would be miserable," he said. "The stress of being at Dartmouth is not healthy.

"Hanging out in a fraternity basement is not healthy. Most of the dining hall food on this campus is nowhere near healthy. But I enjoy all these things, and I'm not going to give them up because of

THE DAILY AZTEC (SAN DIEGO STATE U.)

SAN DIEGO - San Diego State University's basketball teams are not in the NCAA Tournament, but if the Aztecs ever won a national title, the celebration could look like

Hundreds of students gathered at the starting line in front of a campus parking structure late at night on March 21 after the Facebook. com group "SDSU Official Undie Run" gained nearly 600 members.

Once midnight struck, the crowd ran through Hardy the pedestrian bridge, looped around Tenochca Hall and returned to PS 5. The mass, wearing boxers, briefs, bras and little else, grew as the trek continued.

Organizers Kyle Kuhlmann, senior in advertising, and Ryan Tisinger, a non-SDSU student, said they hoped the non-university sponsored event will gain popularity and become a tradition at SDSU.

The run, Tisinger said, was aimed to get participants to donate clothing to charity.

The relatively small pile of clothes next to him suggested many did not catch on.

"I've done work with the Salvation Army, and we'll call around and see where we can drop it off," Tisinger said

University Police Detective Steven Harshaw said there were no arrests or injuries reported, and there was one noise complaint because of the estimated 200 to 300 participants.

He said a lieutenant informed the department about the run two weeks before and was not specific about how he discovered it.

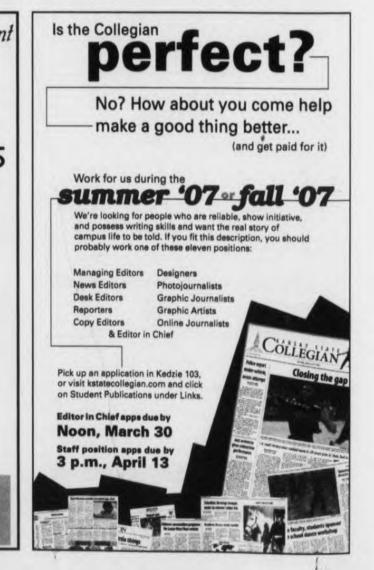

The department prepared for the event in briefings days before the run by reviewing the route and the appropriate positioning for squad cars to minimize traffic disruption, Harshaw said.

scurvy practically has disappeared from society but has been replaced by another condition associated with the blooming season: allergies.

Allergies plague more than 55 million people in the United States, according to the Medical College of Wisconsin.

Kristin Badders, pharmacy manager for Walgreens, said spring is the pharmacy's busiest time of year due to seasonal allergies.

Badders said she sees many allergy sufferers because of molds and pollens from blooming plants.

"We'll see (sufferers) quite often until things dry out a little bit and blooming season goes away the end of May or so," she said. In the meantime, Badders said she frequently dispenses antihistamines like Claritin and Benadryl for seasonal allergy symptoms, which include runny noses, sneezing, watery eyes, itching and swelling.

"Benadryl is incredibly effective but tends to make people sleepy," she said. "Claritin is almost equally effective and has the benefit of not making people very drowsy."

For example, SGA allocated $150,000 last year for diversity programs, and will allocate the same amount next school year.

The education opportunity program, which helps fund academically centered campus organizations, receives $100,000, Wagner said.

SGA also allocates $130,000 every year to the Collegiate Readership Program, which provides students with the many newspapers available on campus.

SGA no longer will fund some programs, Wagner said. For the last few years SGA allocated $100,000 for classroom improvements, but will not next year. This was partly because of the need to focus on other maintenance issues.

"We would love to improve classrooms, but the issue is deferred maintenance," Wagner said.

about this' and that's what this is," Edelman said. "Seder means 'order' in Hebrew, and there is an order of telling the story, and that's what we do.

"It's all for communicating to those who do not know what happened and why, and why we worship God."

During the week of Passover, it is traditional for a Jewish family to celebrate a Seder meal, in which many dishes are symbolic. Some of these dishes include horseradish to symbolize the bitterness of slavery and an egg to represent new life.

A primary symbol of Passover is the matzo, or flat, unleavened bread, which the Israelites hurriedly made after their hasty escape from Egypt. During Passover, the Torah calls for Jews not to eat any leavened products, including bread, pasta or beer.

Although the Passover meal usually is celebrated as a family event, the Manhattan Jewish Congregation chooses to celebrate as a community

"This is one of the few congregations that I know that celebrates a community Seder," said Ben Lange, member of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation. "Most congregations do not – it's very much a family holiday – but we like to think of ourselves here as our family."

For K-State students who practice Judaism, being away from family during Passover can be difficult. However, some say having an option in Manhattan helps fill the void.

"It's nice, because sometimes the high holidays fall during the week, and students can't leave," said Sarah Waxman, second-year student in veterinary medicine. "If I can, I prefer to be home with my family. But I if I can't, I'm glad that they are here."

Though nearly all of the nation's Jewish population celebrates Passover, students said small-town idiosyncrasies still make celebrating in Manhattan difficult.

"Here, it's a little tough because I can't always find the products in the grocery store," Waxman said. "They have the items at Dillons, but you usually have to track someone down and tell them what the box looks like."

Nearly 25 students attended the Passover Seder last night. Members of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation said students are always welcome and a special part of their congregation.

"We provide a home base for them," Edelman said.

Kansas to nominate 8 state wonders

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA - A nonprofit group that educates people about Kansas is asking residents to submit nominations for the Eight Wonders of Kansas.

It's a Kansas spin on the Seven Wonders of the World. While the state's top attractions include casinos, the Kansas Speedway, theme parks and state parks, the contest is not limited to things to do. Instead, it includes the eight elements of rural culture the Kansas Sampler Foundation uses to promote communities: architecture, art, commerce, cuisine, customs, geography, history and people. Places that are nominated must be publicly accessible and likely to be around for a while.

"We are trying to do two things: get people to talking about Kansas places and next hope they will travel around to see these places," said Marci Penner, director of the Kansas Sampler Foundation in Inman.

The contest was launched during a recent rural economic conference in Salina, and Penner said she already has received numerous suggestions.

"One guy said there were no wonders in Kansas," Penner said. "Another said

The contest has the support of state officials, who hope the effort boosts tourism and draws attention to quirky attractions, such as Big Brutus in Cherokee County, the giant ball of twine in Cawker City or the Garden of Eden in Lucas.

"The best places you can find are in those small towns, in some of those family-owned restaurants that fix fried chicken and fresh-baked pies," said Caleb Asher, spokesman for the Kansas Department of Commerce. "Those hidden treasures are something we are lucky to have."

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius will announce the winning eight wonders on Jan. 29, 2008 – Kansas Day.

Jay Price, associate professor of history at Wichita State University, is on the selection committee.

"There is a real creativity to it," Price said. "This is uniquely Kansan."

Concealed-carry law goes to Sebelius

TOPEKA - Cities and counties would not be allowed to impose additional restrictions on Kansans who have state permits to carry concealed guns under a ill sent Monday to Gov. Kathen Sebelius.

"State government occupies he field of concealed carry

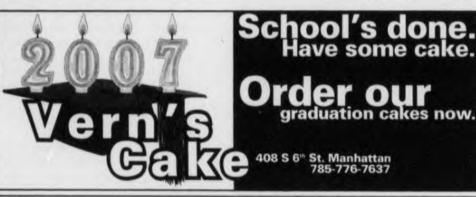

- one law, one regulation, same for everybody," said Rep. L. Candy Ruff, D-Leavenworth.

The House passed the bill two weeks ago, but the Senate made technical changes before passing the measure last week. House members had to review those changes, and they voted 106-16 to accept them.

"Governor Sebelius hasn't yet had a chance to review the bill but will do so carefully once it reaches her office," spokeswoman Nicole Corcoran said

Legislators enacted the law last year allowing qualified Kansans to obtain concealed carry permits, over Sebelius' veto. The law bans hidden guns in some locations like schools and courthouses, and allows businesses to forbid them by posting Supporters of the law said some cities, particularly in Johnson County, enacted their own, tougher restrictions. Among other things, the bill prevents concealed guns from being banned in public parking lots.

Excuses prove to be not enough

"I can't, because I have an exam

"My parents are in town."

Those are just a few of the many excuses I commonly use to defend why I can't do something. It's truly amazing how we can come up with excuses for everything.

There is one situation, however, where no excuse will suffice: the decision to wear a condom.

As a member of SHAPE, I often hear the excuse about condoms being too expensive. Please allow me to paint you the following picture.

At Classic Wine & Spirits liquor store, a 30-pack of Bud Light costs $16.30. Additionally, a pair of Faro Original Fit Silver Brand jeans checks in at more than $80 a pair. I think it is safe to say most of us wouldn't dream of going without drinking some Bud Light or wearing blue jeans.

Why, then, are we so quick to engage in sexual intercourse without proper protection? I'm not talking about the birth control pill. The birth control pill and other contraceptives only are effective against pregnancy. I'm talking about condoms. SHAPE and Lafene Health Center make it easy for you. You can get free condoms at a SHAPE presentation or in the K-State Sudent Union at a SHAPE information table. Condoms also are available for 20 cents each at the Lafene Health Center Pharmacy or the Women's Clinic.

Members of the Manhattan Music Coalition convene Sunday afternoon at P.J.'s Bar to plan for the upcoming KonzaFest music event. MMC works with local bands to help give Manhattan a strong music scene.

Coalition works to support local, rising musicians

By Eric Brown KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During the late '80s and early '90s, the Manhattan music scene was privileged to showcase a wealth of then-unknown acts that would go on to become some of today's top art-

These performers included the likes of Weezer, The Flaming Lips, Bela Fleck and the Flecktones, and Uncle Tupelo, a band which would later split up to form the critically-acclaimed Son Volt and Grammy-winning Wilco.

However, there was a problem. No one showed up to see them.

"There were seriously about 20 people at those shows," said Sarah Cunnick, co-owner of Sisters of Sound music store and longtime follower of the Manhattan music scene. "And it was the same people going to every show. Even though these were great bands, there was no support at the time."

With this lack of support for the music scene, up-and-coming bands stopped frequenting the Little Apple. Local musicians also suffered from the lack of musical interest.

"I can remember when there were seriously only about five local bands in this town," Cunnick said. "The problem we kept running into was that no one wanted to pay even a $3 cover for a band they hadn't heard of, whether for local bands or bands on the rise.

"So no bands wanted to play here, which is frustrating. Just because you haven't heard of a band doesn't mean * it isn't great music. All great bands have to start somewhere."

Five years ago, frustrated band members, venue and record store owners and local music supporters began to unite in what would become the Manhattan Music Coalition. Their goal was to give Manhattan the solid music scene it once could have

And MMC knew where it had to

"Local bands are the key to a good music scene, and that's where our support is focused right now," said Dave Spiker, local musician and member of the Manhattan Music Coalition since its beginning.

"This town has probably 70 bands or more now, and there is a great deal of talent worth hearing. But a lot of people don't know that. We want to bring more attention to this, first and foremost."

to discuss ideas for promoting local music, and the meeting also is used as a medium of communication between members of different bands.

The coalition also started AggieFest and KonzaFest - all-day, multivenue music festivals - with the intention of promoting local bands, and uses its MySpace.com Web site to list shows going on in the Aggieville business district.

Local musicians said they appreciate the coalition's support.

"It's good to know that someone else is out there helping promote your music and your shows," said Bret Palmer, bassist for local band Shhh. "It's definitely nice to have some support from an outside source. I feel the local scene has improved tremendously during their existence."

Cunnick, a member of MMC, said establishing support for local music can lead to bringing in bigger-name acts, like the groups that once made stops in Manhattan. And, she said, that potentially could benefit local bands

"We would like to eventually get bigger acts to play in town and have local bands play the opening slots," Cunnick said. "This would allow them to possibly make connections in the industry and could also expose them to a broader audience. We're always striving for what's best for the music scene, and what also will benefit our local artists."

So while bigger-name bands might Now, the MMC meets on the first be on the horizon for Manhattan, the Sunday of every month at P.J.'s Bar coalition has other ideas for the future, some of which include the expansion of KonzaFest. MMC members said their mission always will stay the same.

'Our primary goal will always be to connect local musicians to willing audiences here in the area and to never let music education die in our community," said Evan Tuttle, who joined the MMC in July 2006. "And we will also continue striving to improve the common person's perception and reception of live music in Manhattan."

Indie artists use unusual styles to create sound

Album Reviews by Mark Sibilla

The Fratellis "Costello Music" ****

I didn't want to like the debut album from this Glasgow indie-rock trio, mostly because of the oversaturation of single "Flathead" on recent iPod commercials. I thought the last thing the world needed was another weak garage-rockrevival band (e.g. Jet, The Arctic Monkeys), but after several listens to "Costello Music," my attitude toward the band changed drastically. While these men don't deviate far from the simple guitar, bass, drum setup, they do manage to craft 13 catchy, high-energy songs about the troubles and confusion created by women. The Fratellis' debut deserves a listen, as it will get your toes tapping and give you plenty of songs to hum on your way to class. Additional props go to the band for using '50s pin-up-style art on the album's cover and throughout the lyric booklet.

Marnie Stern "In Advance of the Broken Arm" ****

Marnie Stern is a guitarist from New York whose debut album was co-produced by Hella drummer Zach Hill. Stern is a talented guitarist who blends harder, more experimental, noiserock elements to her playing of what would be conventional indie-rock tunes. Stern constructs knotty, turn-on-a-dime riffs that wouldn't sound out of place in a '70s prog-rock album, but she keeps her frenzied energy focused. Even when she goes on twisty solo tangents, she never loses sight of her original groove. While Stern's arpeggios and Hill's frenetic drumming at times can be a little overwhelming - especially with the lack of a lower register on most songs - when Stern is at her best, she creates an interesting and original debut that is an excellent gateway album to harder, more noise-oriented bands.

Califone "Roots & Crowns" ****

This creative Chicago-based, Tim Rutili-led band clearly is on a roll in its efforts to create music based in American roots-rock, blues and folk that adds experimental elements like field recordings, samples, white noise and odd instrumentation to create an exciting and innovative sound. Califone's past two albums for label Thrill Jockey were astounding, and "Roots & Crowns" is no exception. The band's use of acoustic instrumentation augmented with electronic elements is further refined on this, Califone's seventh album; meanwhile Rutili's lyrics remain as cryptic as ever. Highlights include "A Chinese Actor," which contains chugging guitars, unusual percussion and layers of noise, and the quasi-funk of "Pink & Sour," with a guitar solo that wouldn't sound out of place on the Talking Heads' "Remain in Light."

Increased tuition pays for salaries

Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students taking an average of 15 credit hours per semester pay approximately $2500 each semester. That amount, multiplied by the 23,000 students attending K-State, adds up to a lot of money - and that amount is growing.

Students paid more than $107 million in tuition for the 2006-2007 school year, including the summer semester, said Cindy Bontrager, K-State budget director.

Tuition gradually increased over the last few years because the money K-State received from the government has not been enough to cover rising university costs.

"Because the state's funding has not kept up with the need, the student's (fund) has grown, and so when we look at the general-use budget, a bigger share of it comes from general-fees tuition," Bontrager said.

The increase in expenses is because of many factors. For example, Hale library constantly needs extra funding to keep up with the increasing costs of scholarly journals and other resources provided for students.

K-State also is working to increase its faculty salaries. K-State faculty are paid less on average than any other faculty in the Big 12 Conference, said Bruce Shubert, associate vice president of administration and finance.

The $107 million from tuition, along with the funds the government allocates to K-State (approximately $110 million for the last school year), is divided into three broad categories: salary, salary benefits and other operating expenditures (OOE), Bontrager said.

Approximately $43 million from tuition helps pay the salaries of faculty members, professors and students working for the university. Another $10 million is used for salary benefits.

OOE is the broadest of the three categories and includes almost everything unrelated to

A large portion of the OOE, $9.1 million, goes toward funding need-based aid for students.

"There's a big piece that is allocated directly from your tuition for financial aid," Bontrag-

Utilities cost the university $11.3 million in tuition money, and are becoming more expensive. Last year an additional $1.50 per credit hour was added to pay for increasing utility expenses, Bontrager said.

The Student Governing Association is responsible for allocating a certain amount of funding toward areas voted on by the Student Senate, like programs that receive no other outside funding and new programs and initiatives.

Many of the projects SGA funds are continual, said Matt

Choral studies director plans to retire soon

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Signed photographs of prominent musicians, such as composer Aaron Copeland and American choral director Robert Shaw, line the walls of Rod Walker's office in McCain Auditorium. Plaques proclaim accomplishments saying thanks for "10 years of devotion" and "30 years of inspiration."

One photo shows the dedication concert for the opening of McCain Auditorium. Another shows Walker conducting K-State students performing at Carnegie Hall and others of the choir performing in places around the world like Germany, England, Australia, Paris and Amsterdam, Nether-

Although he has traveled to all these places. Walker has been the director of choral studies at K-State for the past 41 years. He will retire at the end of this semester.

Walker was born in McCook, Neb., a town of about 10,000. He became involved in music in fifth grade when he was a drummer. Although he was involved in sports and band throughout high school, he was not in choir until his senior year.

"It was more cool to be in the band than it was the choir," he said.

However, once he did begin singing, he realized he was good at it, and he loved it.

"I realized I could make a noise that people thought was pleasant," he said, "or perhaps they felt sorry for me. You never know for sure."

At one point in his life, he almost turned away from his potential music career. He played sports all through high school and had a chance to sign with a couple major league baseball teams. He chose to go on to college because baseball did not pay

"Once they started making us run up and down the coliseum stairs, I thought, 'Enough of that - I'll stay in a practice room in a music department," Walker said.

Walker knew he wanted to do something in music as a career, but he was not sure what. Conducting turned out to be his favorite, he said. Though he sang opera during college,

Victory tight for city commission

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The difference between victory and loss was less than five votes for spots in two top Manhattan governmental bodies in Tuesday's elec-

Incumbent Jayme Morris-Hardeman lost the race for a seat on the city commission by four votes to Jim Sherow, who won a two-year term with 2,545 votes. Also, Karen Hummel won a seat on the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education with 2,419 votes, three more than Curt Herrman.

Hummel said her niece Donna Ekart, who works in Hale Library, called her when the preliminary results were announced Tuesday evening to congratulate her. She said she was still waiting to see the final

"It's a big responsibility, and I'll certainly do my best," Hummel said.

However, the results could change next week. Deputy Riley County Clerk Jolene Campbell said there were 87 provisional ballots filled out in the election. A provisional ballot is when the validity of a voter's registration is questionable and must be checked before being added to the tally, she said.

Campbell said the valid provisional votes will be counted and added to the total on Monday, which could sway the election for Morris-Hardeman and Herrman.

Sherow, associate professor of history, thanked the people who helped his campaign, including several students who helped get him elected. He said he was humbled by being chosen by the voters.

"That, of course, brings about a tremendous sense of public responsibility," Sherow said.

Bob Strawn and Bruce Snead won four-year terms on the city

The seven o'clock sun heated the glass doors of the Riley County Office Building on Tuesday night, creating a silhouette of Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board candidate Kurt Herrman.

Herrman was shifting from foot to foot and making small talk with curious citizens. He was the first candidate to arrive at the clerk's office, where votes for the city council and school board elections were to be counted and announced.

The polls had closed minutes before, but results were still more than two hours away.

"I'm more nervous today than I was at any of the forums," Herrman said. "It's the moment of truth. I hope I did and said the right things. This has definitely been a learning experience."

Now they are moving again to make room for the south downtown redevelopment project.

"I feel being relocated once was enough," Slanary said. "But we've been fair and reasonable with Dial because we don't want to go the eminent domain route."

Dial Realty is the developer working on the redevelopment project with the city.

They have been trying to negotiate agreements with property owners for the project, but the city commission agreed as part of the project to use eminent domain to remove any property owners that did not make agreements with Dial.

Eminent domain comes from Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which reads, "... nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that using it to take land for economic development is constitutional.

Developers are pushing the south project because of a law passed by the Kansas Legislature last year. The law ends the city's ability to use eminent domain to buy property for economic development purposes on July 1.

The city commission voted to use condemnation on two property owners in the north project last year and approved an ordinance to begin condemnation proceedings on properties in the south downtown redevelopment area Tuesday evening.

The south redevelopment project extends from Fort Riley Boulevard to the south and east. Fourth Street to the west and Pierre Street to the north. The city plans to replace the current businesses there with a discovery center, a theater, hotel and conference center, parking garage, restaurants and retail stores.

Tuesday's meeting was the second reading of the ordinance that allows government entities to acquire private properties through eminent domain, a constitutional right enacted through statutory law, said William Frost, city attorney.

"Under this law, court-appointed

Reality of Iraq

Lyndsey Born | COLLEGIAN

CPT William Arnett and LTC David Seigal, both assigned to the First Infantry Division, talk about their time in Iraq at the K-State Student Union Little Theater Tuesday evening.

Diplomacy important in field, soldiers say

By Andrew LeValley KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The war in Iraq involves more than just soldiers going into battle; it also incorporates diplomacy and interaction with the Iraqi people, two soldiers said in a presentation Tuesday night.

Lt. Col. David Seigel and Capt. William Arnett, both of the 1st Infantry Division, shared their experiences and thoughts about the war in Iraq at the K-State Student Union Little Theater.

The soldiers' speech addressed the reality of the situation in Iraq versus what the media portrays. The two emphasized the media's exaggeration of the brutal fighting taking place.

"It's not as bad as what you see in the news," Seigel said. "There are times when it is bad; but that is maybe 5 percent of the time. There are a lot"of other things we're doing."

One of the main goals the soldiers are trying to accomplish is gaining the trust of the Iraqi people and the surrounding tribes, they said.

"It's a big tribal system throughout Iraq," Seigel said. "Once you have trust within the tribe, sometimes you can get a lead, (for example) on where bombs are being made."

To gain the trust of these tribes, the soldiers act as diplomats at times.

"I shake a lot of hands, and it's customary to kiss on the cheek," Seigel said. "There are sheep herds everywhere. Sometimes we'll buy 30-40 sheep and bring them to a neighborhood."

Seigel and Arnett have many years of military experience. Both men attended the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. Seigel was involved with Operation Desert Shield and Operation Desert Storm, and the Kuwaiti War. Arnett also served in Kuwait in 2001.

Arnett went to Kuwait again in 2003 to prepare for Operation Iraqi Freedom. During their tours in Iraq, Seigel predominately was based in Sadr City and Arnett was in Baqubah.

After the initial presentation, the men answered several questions from the audience. During the question-and-answer session, an audience member asked how the general population of Iraq feels toward the American sol-

"The general population is tolerant," Seigel said, "But let's be honest - the polls show they don't want us there, but they don't want us to leave because they know we provide protection for them."

Some Iraqis show the same protection for the American soldiers, Arnett said.

"Part of the Arab culture is that if you're a guest, they're responsible for your safety," he Seigel and Arnett both expressed their gratitude toward the American people.

"Coming back from (rest and relaxation), I was amazed," Seigel said. "I felt like a rock star. You feel the support of the American people and it makes it all worthwhile."

City moves toward condemnation, issues bonds to retirement center

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city commission voted unanimously to approve the second reading of an ordinance allowing the condemnation of property in the south redevelopment project at its meeting Tuesday night.

Seven out of 23 properties are still unattained by Dial Realty, the developer working with the city. During any time of the condemnation process, any of the property owners can choose to negotiate an agreement with Dial Realty to sell and relocate and therefore end the pro-

Rick Kiolbasa, partner at Dial Realty, said the company is in negotiation for three of the properties, leaving only four for which the city might have to invoke eminent domain.

Pernell Peters, district manager for O'Reilly Auto Parts, spoke to the commission on behalf of the employees of the business. He said the employees of the business, many of which were in the audience, would lose their jobs if a suitable relocation site is not found for the

"It will be devastating to these people," Peters said. "They will lose their livelihood."

The commissioners agreed all efforts must go toward keeping the businesses from being hurt.

Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman said she was concerned about maintaining these businesses in the community.

"We are asking these businesses to relocate," Morris-Hardeman said. "We're maybe even forcing them to relocate. We need to make sure they maintain a viable business in the community."

Mayor Bruce Snead said the decision must be made with Manhattan's long-term benefits in mind.

"It's certainly one of the most difficult things commissioners ever have to do," Snead said.

Commissioners also voted unanimously to approve a resolution concerning the relocation benefits of tenants in the south end redevelop-

People living within in the redevelopment area are required to relocate. As defined by the redevelopment plan they will receive certain relocation benefits, which will come from a special obligation bond issued by the city - in this case, STAR bonds.

Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, said this money will not be available to tenants until late May or early June.

Some tenants have expressed the need to receive the relocation benefits earlier because they have found places to relocate and need the money to make the move and not have to make two rent payments at the same time, according to city staff.

The resolution will give the city permission to administer the relocation benefits early to tenants who provide proper documentation of their move. The money will come from the redevelopment project fund, which will be reimbursed when the special obligation bonds are Hilgers said probably only three to five tenants would take advantage of this.

Commissioners also unanimously voted to approve the first reading of a bond ordinance to issue up to $29 million in Health Care Facility Revenue Bonds to Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community.

These are bonds issued specifically for the expansion of a facility.

Last November, the city voted in favor of a resolution of intent to issue up to $55 million for the expansion of Meadowlark Hills. The city has issued slightly more than $25 million in bonds for the community already.

· Meadowlark Hills, a nonprofit organization, is planning to use the bonds for a four-phase expansion of its facilities to be completed in 2009, according to city staff. It will add 26 new independent living units, two healthcare nursing households to house 40 people, and other Commissioners also voted unanimously to approve a first reading of an ordinance that will amend the Final Development Agreement. A Taco Bell restaurant will go in near where Best Buy and Wendy's are located. Originally a Long John Silver's was to be built there.

TO THE POINT

Eminent domain not justifiable for Manhattan

Let's rethink this.

The Supreme Court ruled there is no problem Constitutionally with using eminent domain to make room for economic development, but that did not make it

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed This is the Collegian's official right. The city commission is making a mistake by rushing the south redevelopment just so it does not lose an option of acquiring property.

First, it should be concerned with how Manhattan's image is affected by its government's use of eminent domain.

The fact that the Kansas Legislature made the practice illegal speaks volumes as to how Kansans feel about condemning the land out from under someone.

Second, by pushing ahead with these plans and making decisions ahead of time, the likelihood of making the wrong choices is multiplied.

Manhattan will be stuck with the results of this redevelopment for decades. Shooting from the hip could hurt this town down the line.

Third, negotiations have been unfair to property owners in the project areas because the threat of condemnation has been hanging over their heads since the beginning. They are left with the choice between "move" and "move," and it is hard to blame them for not liking it.

It might be the legal option, it might be the effective option, but it's not the best

It's just easier than doing all the work it will take to figure out what is really best for Manhattan.

New resolutions

Students should strive to learn about senate's role on campus

Farewell, Maddy duo. Hello, Matt and Lydia.

As the term for Student Governing Association membership comes to a close April 5, it's important not only to reflect on this year's list of accomplishments of our fellow student leaders.

ANNETTE LAWLESS

It's important to press for what our new inductees can accomplish for K-State in 2007-08.

Student Governing Association K-State's premiere student governing body - has enacted several important resolutions in Wildcat country over the years. From promoting multi-thousand dollar diversity funding to expanding the K-State blue light safety system, Senate has made a name for itself in promoting great change

More notorious resolutions, however, including the tin-can Bosco Clock Tower and the overtly expensive K-State Student Union parking garage have overshadowed its good deeds.

The student body then questions what these student leaders truly want - to help recruitment, to spend our money or to build their resumés.

Senate, I'll admit that despite how ridiculous I think the organization can be, it serves an overwhelming purpose here at K-State. The 60 student senators and hundreds more who lead this university are pushing us in a direction that, hopefully, will make Manhattan a better place.

This year, SGA sent students abroad, recognized leaders for their accomplishments and even recruited K-Staters to speak with legislators about issues like deferred maintenance.

It's hard to imagine just where this university would be without the dedication of these students with a vision.

While some members of this governing body do have a vision, I am sure many of them could use some help - after all, it's you whom they represent.

For those who didn't make it onto senate, there still are plenty of ways to become involved on campus. Student Body Presidentelect Matt Wagner said students can get involved with SGA by checking out its Web site, www. ksu.edu/sga.

On the site, there are several executive board, judicial board, at-large committee and task force positions available. Positions vary from coordinating events during dead week to helping establish the a platform goal of Wagner and vice-president-elect Lydia Peele.

about jumping on the SGA bandwagon, it's important to become involved while here at K-State. According to a 2007 Corporation for National and Community Service study, less than 30 percent of students volunteer or are active leaders in their universities. This is not enough.

Service groups and other ongoing community efforts need support - your support - for shaping the ideal community of the Little

According to CNN, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., spoke to the National Federation of Republican Women about the perils of bilingual education, claiming it promotes the language of living in the ghetto.

The rationale behind this is that because to gain citizenship, immigrants must pass an test on U.S. history that is administered in English, there is no need for bilingual education in the United States

This simply is not true. Children who are raised in non-Englishspeaking households have a hard time at school attempting to learn English and simultaneously succeed in other classes.

According to the CNN article, "Abolish bilingual education, Gingrich urges," published online March 3, in a bilingual education program, students learn core subjects like math and science in their native language while learning English in a separate class.

The benefit of this is that students actually are able to learn, instead of trying to understand all-new material in their second language, English.

While the United States has no official language at the federal level, English is the primary language. However, according to www. infoplease.com, about 28 million Americans speak Spanish, and that number continues to increase every year. There also has been an increase in the number of people learning other languages. Enrollment in Chinese classes is up 35.8 percent, and in Arabic classes is up 27.9 percent.

Since the United States is known as the "melting pot" of the world, full of different cultures and ethnicities, it would be plausible to think Americans would be open to other languages besides English. However, even though most Americans eat Mexican food or have clothes that were made in other countries, they still are discriminatory toward other cultures.

This is snobbery at the highest level. Americans believe other countries and people should conform to their lifestyle, whether it be through language or religious practices.

The United States prides itself on having freedom of speech and religion, yet there is such a bias against immigrants it almost is impossible for them to receive a fair education or job, even though they came into the country legally.

Gingrich's stereotypical statement that being bilingual is "ghetto" further demonstrates this point. Children of immigrants stand no chance in our education system if they are not taught English separately from other classes

It is understandable that those coming into the United States should expect to learn English, but this should go both ways. Americans should be willing to learn other languages when they travel or move to other countries.

Having bilingual programs doesn't mean the United States is. steering away from English as its main language; rather it is showcasing the ability for the United States to receive immigrants with open arms as they learn English effective-

After all, unless your ancestors were 100-percent America Indian, you descended from immigrants.

Maybe Gingrich should research his family tree before making such a close-minded statement about bilingual cultures.

BRITAIN DEMANDS DIRECT BILATERAL TALKS WITH IRAN IN STANDOFF

LONDON - Britain called for direct talks with Iran over 15 captive Britons on Tuesday after speaking for the first time with the chief Iranian negotiator. The announcement followed the sudden release of an Iranian diplomat in Iraq that raised new hope in resolving the standoff.

In a statement late Tuesday, Prime Minister Tony Blair's Downing Street office said. "Both sides share a desire for an early resolution to this issue through direct talks."

Hours after Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett cautioned against expecting a swift resolution to the crisis, Downing Street struck an upbeat note, announcing there had been "further contacts" between the two countries, including with chief negotiator Ali Larijani.

"The prime minister remains committed to resolving this by diplomatic means. The UK has proposed direct bilateral discussions and awaits an Iranian response on when these can begin," Blair's office

THOUSANDS SET UP CAMP IN UKRAINE TO PROTEST BREAKUP OF PARLIAMENT

KIEV. Ukraine - Thousands of flag-waving supporters of Ukraine's prime minister set up a camp near the parliament building Tuesday to protest a decision by the pro-Western president to dissolve the legislative body and call for early elections.

The two leaders, whose rivalry dates to the 2004 Orange Revolution that swept President Viktor Yushchenko to power, met in Yushchenko's office for a four-hour talk to try to resolve the standoff - the most serious political crisis in Ukraine in years.

At the start, Yushchenko in a lecturing tone, reminded Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych that "according to the constitution, a presidential order must be fulfilled."

CHINA ORDERS MEDIA TO STOP DEMANDING MONEY FOR COVERAGE

BEIJING - China's government has ordered newspapers to stamp out the common practice of demanding money from people they cover, a state news agency said Tuesday, after the killing of a newspaper employee drew attention to the industry's seamier side.

Newspapers also must make sure only properly accredited reporters are allowed to conduct news-gathering, the China News Service said. citing an order by the national news industry regulator.

The order followed the beating death in January of newspaper employee Lan Chengzhang, who earlier reports said tried to extort money from a mine owner by threatening to publicize his illegal operation.

"News bureaus must not use news coverage to demand that subjects buy newspapers or advertising or to do such activities as using 'exposure' in reporting to extort money," CNS said, citing the order.

IRAQI OFFICIALS FED UP WITH SEARCHES, PLAN TO TAKE ACTION

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Government officials and lawmakers say they are fed up with what they feel are unnecessary searches by American troops and private security contractors in the Green Zone and persuaded President Jalal Talabani to take action, his office said Tuesday.

The president, a Kurd, set up a committee to develop new security rules and then meet with U.S. officials to agree on a relationship between American-led coalition forces and all Iraqis, not just officials and lawmakers.

The statement gave no other details, but Shiite legislator, Bassem Sharif, who attended the session at which the committee was established, said politicians complained bitterly about being searched every time they went into the parliament or Cabinet building.

ZIMBABWE TROOPS, POLICE OUT IN FORCE FOR NATIONAL STRIKE

HARARE. Zimbabwe Trucks of riot police drove through Zimbabwe's capital and military helicopters flew overhead Tuesday on the first day of a national strike to protest deepening economic hardships blamed on the government of President Robert Mugabe.

Soldiers armed with automatic rifles stood at intersections in Harare's main industrial district where some factory gates were closed, along with several banks, shops and fastfood stands. Most downtown shops were open, and commuter buses were full of passengers.

Zimbabwe's main trade unions called the two-day strike to protest an economic crisis that has brought 80 percent unemployment, the world's highest inflation rate - 1,700 percent and acute shortages of food, hard currency and gasoline.

Tensions have been high since police violently broke up a prayer meeting last month, detaining and severely beating opposition leader Morgan Tsvangirai and other members of the Movement for Democratic Change.

Binge eating more prevalent than anorexia, bulimia cases

By Eric Brown KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anorexia and bulimia might get more headlines, but studies have found another eating disorder to be more prevalent.

According to the Eating Disorders Coalition for Research, Policy and Action Web site, the chances of both men and women possessing a binge-eating disorder more than double the chances of having anorexia nervosa or bulimia nervosa combined.

Dr. Debra Doubek, director of the Mercy Light Weight Loss Clinic, described binge eating as reoccurring episodes of eating an amount of food larger than what is needed, accompanied by a lack of control to stop the

"A binge eater often intakes 8,000 to 10,000 calories in one sitting." Doubek said. "If this habit occurs at least two times a week for a six-month period, then you have a binge-eating disorder."

Mary Meck Higgins, associate professor of human nutrition, said binge eating can also be a psychological problem.

"It almost becomes something of a ritual or some sort of comfort for many people who battle the disease," Higgins said. "It's as though it fulfills some kind of psychological need for the person."

Both Higgins and Doubek agreed the disease is more common than anorexia and bulimia because it requires less effort.

"Compared to anorexia and bulimia, binge eating is more likely to become a habit because it is easier," Higgins said. "A disease like anorexia takes much more

Do you have binge-eating disorder?

Most people overeat from time to time, and many often feel they have eaten more than they should have. Eating a lot of food does not always mean a person is a binge eater. Doctors generally agree most people with serious binge-eating problems often feel their eating is out of control. Symptoms include

- eating what most people would think is an unusually large amount of food.
   eating much more quickly than usual during binge episodes.
   eating until so full they are uncomfortable.
- eating large amounts of food, even when they are not really hungry.
   eating alone because they are embarrassed about the amount they eat.
- feeling disgusted, depressed or guilty after overeating.

Binge eating also takes place with bulimia nervosa. Persons with bulimia nervosa, ever, usually purge, fast, or do strenuous exercise after they binge eat.

discipline. You're overriding the basic human need of hunger. And with bulimia, making yourself sick is a difficult task as well. It's so much easier to just satisfy and overindulge with food rather than to find ways of denving it."

Higgins' explanation of the ease in developing bingeeating disorder coincides with the statistics. According to eatingdisorderscoalition.org, the chances of women having a binge-eating disorder in her lifetime is 3.5 percent, compared to the 0.9-percent chance of having anorexia nervosa and the 0.5-percent chance of having bulimia nervosa.

The same goes for men. The chances of a male developing a binge-eating disorder more than double those of anorexia and bulimia, with binge eating having a 2-percent possibility, while anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa show only 0.3 and 0.5-percent chances, respectively, for development in men.

Doubek said many who suffer from a binge-eating disorder say their problems were triggered by depression. Doubek also noted that some describe a disassociation episode while binge eating, or they "space out" while eating.

"Poor eating habits and regular overeating can also lead to a binge-eating disorder," Doubek said. "This is where college students put themselves at risk."

Doubek said a number of students come to college, and for the first time, they're on their own with no one monitoring what they eat. And this disorder is something college students should take seriously.

"A binge-eating disorder can be very dangerous," Doubek said. "Not only can it lead to low self-esteem, it can cause obesity, which has potential to lead to bulimia. And the dangers can get worse from there."

But Doubek also said there is help for those with binge-eating disorders. Treatment for the disorder includes therapy and counseling, medication to control eating, support groups, and for drastic measures, sur-

"What's important is that you need get help as soon as you see the signs of this disorder," Doubek said.

"Tonight was a little erratic both ways, but they did just a little bit more walking than we did," coach Brad Hill said. "We had pretty good focus at the plate tonight."

K-State (21-8) continued its "small ball" mentality, scoring its first eight runs without an extra base hit. The Wildcats ended the game with only one, a double by senior Eli Rumler in the eighth inning.

'That's kind of how we do it. It's the way we have been doing it all year long," Hill said.

Esquibel (4-3) was pulled in the first before recording an out, and took the loss for Kansas. The Jayhawks (16-18) then turned to Matt Lane, who yielded similar results as he walked two batters and had a wild pitch while surrendering two more runs to give the Wildcats seven after three innings.

K-State's starting pitcher, Todd Vogel, struggled to put the Jayhawks away early as he gave up six hits, two walks and five runs in the first three innings. The sophomore allowed Kansas to stay in the game, but the Wildcats were able to score enough runs to prevent a comeback.

"The biggest disappointment was the two walks when we were up 7-3," Hill said, referring to the two batters Vogel walked to start the third inning, Sophomore Rob Vaughn gave K-State a little breathing room in the fourth inning with a single that scored sophomore Nate Tenbrink, which put the Wildcats up 8-5.

The Jayhawks were quick to answer as John Allman recorded a run batted in by doubling to right field. The hit in the top of the sixth scored Kyle Murphy. That turned out to be the last run the K-State bullpen would allow.

Freshman Tyler Ruch, sophomore Justin Murray and junior Daniel Edwards combined for five innings and gave up only one run. Ruch recorded the win to move to 2-0 on the season, and Edwards recorded his ninth save of the season after closing out the game without allowing a hit.

The Wildcats increased their lead while the bullpen held strong. Rumler's double in the eighth scored sophomore Byron Wiley. Senior Eddie Vasquez followed Rumler's double with a sacrifice fly to left field that scored Tenbrink and gave the Wildcats a 10-6 lead they would take into the ninth inning.

1. Choose a backpack that is a good size for you, not one that merely looks good. 2. Pack what is needed, and limit personal items. Try utilizing a flash drive or iPod to carry around your assignments; and throw away or weed out extra textbooks and asments each week.

Dall said the body has an interesting way of compensating for previous injury. She explained injury can throw off body mechanics, creating pain in other areas of the body.

"Chronic pain is the alarm system of the body," Dall said, "telling you that there's a problem and aid for correction may be needed. It's not a good idea to stretch chronic pains until the root cause of the pain has been discovered.

Dall said when pains are disregarded, they might subside for a short time, but eventually will return in force.

Whether it's because of studious intent or scholastic overload, it's no wonder many students complain about their backpacks literally being a burden. In fact, after weighing my personal book

TRENT SCOTT bag containing an average day's payload, I found I routinely lug around more than 20 pounds. That might not sound like much, but when you consider the fact that many students bear that load for five to six hours a day, it is easy to see how your backpack can wreak havoc on your lower back.

So how can you alleviate this pain?

Aside from decreasing the weight of your book bag, strengthening your core really can help to lessen the strain on your lower back.

According to the American Council on Exercise, "Having a strong core is essential because the body's core muscles serve as the foundation for all other movement. The muscles of the hips and torso help stabilize the spine and pelvis. and provide the foundation for safe and efficient movement in the extremities. Training the muscles of the core may also help correct postural imbalances that can lead to injuries."

These muscles include rectus abdominis, transversus abdominis, internal and external obliques and erector spinae. Together they make a natural "safety belt" to protect your spine.

Cool treats can be hard to resist once warm weather

During spring, people enjoy ice cream cones and slushes more frequently.

Tad's Tropical Sno offers a variety of snow cones. Tad's reopened Monday, after closing in September for the winter months.

Tad's is a franchise with five locations around Kansas. The Manhattan branch has been open for 10 years.

Tad's offers 125 flavors and allows customers the option of mixing flavors for an extra cost.

"The most popular snow cone ordered would have to be summer breeze, which is strawberry, peach, and watermelon," said Breanna Tatro, employee of Tad's.

The busiest time of the day to get snow cones is at 8:30 p.m., Tatro said.

Getting snow cones is like a preview of summer, said Amanda Waterman, Manhattan resident.

"Tad's is cool and easy on the wallet," said Denise Meyer, junior in elementary education Katie Guthrie, student at Manhattan Christian College, agreed.

"It's ice and sugar, and it makes me feel like it's not that bad for me, like ice cream," she said.

Cold Stone Creamery, located in Aggieville, is another popular place for frozen treats.

Cold Stone allows its customers to choose from a variety of flavors and add-ins while they watch.

Mary Bollin, Cold Stone employee and junior in biology, said the most popular ice cream is cake batter. She also said the most popular mixtures are "Birthday Cake" and "Cookie Doughn't

You Want Some."

"As far as ice cream, you can do anything here," Bollin said.

There are many ways to mix ice cream at Cold Stone to create a personal flavor.

With the option to create any combination of ice cream, some bold people mix something out of the ordinary.

"I had a guy order a cheesecake ice cream with mint, raspberry and Oreo mixing," Bollin said.

Other options to keep cool from the heat include ice cream cakes, smoothies and shakes.

If feelings of guilt arise, smoothies can be a good option.

Cold Stone serves smoothies with nutritional supplements, including ginseng, soy protein, ginkgo biloba and green-tea extract.

Cold Stone also has included "sinless" ice cream into its line, which include non-fat, non-dairy, no-sugar added or a combination.

At Sonic, known for its many types of slushes, customers can choose from a famous slush, fresh fruit slushes, juice slushes, cream slushes and Powerade slush-

Gloria Baxter, Sonic employee and senior in marketing, said the most frequently ordered slush is cherry limeade.

Sonic also serves Sonic Blasts made of whipped ice cream with mixings of M&M's, Oreos, Reese's Peanut Butter Cups or Butterfingers.

"The most-ordered ice cream on the menu would have to be Sonic Blasts," Baxter said.

Sonic also serves regular sundaes, banana splits and a variety of shakes and floats.

Many places serve cool desserts to satisfy students' sweet tooths. On campus, try Call Hall, K-State's own dairy bar, for ice cream treats.

Wichita State creates institute to study many aspects of aging

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – Wichita State University plans to open an institute that will coordinate research on several aspects of aging, from Alzheimer's disease to helping the elderly with driving and reading prob-

The university has partnered with Larksfield Place, a continuing-care retirement community, to find ways to help the elderly with many problems they face.

The institute, which will be announced officially on Wednesday, is planned to better coordinate the partnership with Larksfield, help researchers, advocate for their work and seek grants, The Wichita Eagle reported Tuesday.

"The institute will marshal our forces at the university. ... We've got more than 20 people doing research on aging issues in several departments," said Gary Miller, vice president for academic affairs and research at Wichita State. "It will also merge their work with some of the fine partners we have."

Wichita State University wanted Larksfield's partnership because its staff works with the elderly every day, supplementing the work done by Wichita State researchers, said Valerie McGhee, Larksfield's president and chief executive.

"We can make sure we bring the voices and the ideas of the elders back to the researchers," McGhee said.

Teresa Radebaugh, who has worked at the National Institute on Aging and with the National Institutes of Health, has been hired to run the new institute. Some of the topics researchers address include problems with elders driving, finding new ways to get federal aid to grandparents raising grand-children, the evacuation of elderly people during natural disasters and training nurses in long-term care.

Aging is a growing national challenge, said Philip Gaunt, director of Wichita State University-Link, a company that works to create partnerships between Wichita State University and the community.

"The fastest-growing demographic in the country is the group of elderly older than 85," he said. "There are elderly parents now taking care of elderly parents. There are perceptions about aging, and misperceptions. ... There are many things Wichita State University is working on."

Sierra Club files suit over power plant

By David Twiddy
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

An environmental group on Monday filed a lawsuit against the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, demanding that the department hold a formal hearing on a controversial coal-fired power plant near Holcomb, Kan.

The Sierra Club, which filed the suit in Shawnee County District Court, said it asked for a "quasi-judicial hearing" in February so it could challenge parts of Sunflower Electric Power Corp's application for a permit to add three 700-megawatt units to its existing 350-megawatt plant.

It says that request was denied in a March 2 letter from the department.

The Hays-based company wants the department to declare that the project would meet all applicable standards for controlling air pollution. KDHE still is reviewing hundreds of pages of comments about the project, spokesman Joe Blubaugh said.

He said the department's legal staff was not available to comment on the lawsuit.

Sierra Club members claim the plant will worsen air pollution in the region while the company plans to sell the majority of the plant's generated energy to utilities outside the state.

In December, attorneys general in California, Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, New York, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin wrote a letter to state officials saying Sunflower's project would undermine their states' efforts to control emissions of greenhouse gases.

"We think this application raises very serious issues that warrant a full hearing," said Nick Persampieri, an attorney representing the Sierra Club on behalf of Washingtonbased Earthjustice.

Sunflower spokesman Steve Miller said the company was still reviewing the suit, but said the expansion would follow all of the state's requirements.

Student artists describe creative processes

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For as long as people hav lived on this planet, there has been creation. Throughout the ages, people have developed new and interesting ways to pass time and solve problems.

From painting to building, people create to fill needs, pass time or help soothe themselves during a difficult time. The road of creation is " a journey with myriad beginnings and endings.

Margaret Sweany, senior in psychology, said she uses art to express her creativity. She started painting in high school, and she said her creativity has continued to grow and expand into other areas.

Sweany said her preferred method of creation is watercolor, but only in the classroom. At home and away from class. Sweany said she prefers knitting and making crafty objects like jewelry. She said she finds inspiration from many places.

"If I see a flower that I like, I'll pick it and take it home or to class to paint it," Sweany said. "It's that same way with jewelry. If I see someone wearing a necklace or something else that I like, I try to go home and make it."

Sweany also listed the therapeutic aspect of creation as a reason for why she paints.

"I like the way that creating allows me to express my emotions," Sweany said. "What I paint or make depends a lot on the mood I am in, too. Sometimes when I am in a bad mood, I will create kind of dark things. I don't let people see those."

For the past four winters, Sweany turned to knitting to satisfy her creative itch. She said she likes to knit Christmas presents, though she is not a master with the nee-

As she nears graduation, Sweany said her creativity will not be affected.

"I am looking forward to life after graduation because it will give me more time to paint and create things," Sweany said. "At least I will have more time than I do

Another way students create is through the art of writing. Angela Whay, junior in organizational communications, said she turned to writing when she realized she was not a good artist.

"I am a horrible artist," Whay said. "I am not good with lines and things that don't turn into words."

Whay said she enjoys writing poems and short stories. However, unlike Sweany, Whay said she does not let her emotions affect what she writes. She said she will write when in a bad mood in an attempt to cheer herself up.

"I don't like to talk about dark things when I write," Whay said. "I would rather write about things that are happening in the world, or my Whay, a published poet since the fifth grade, said recent time constraints have put a damper on her writing, and she does not get to write as much as she would like.

When asked what she wanted to do with her writing later in life, Whay said she would like to go further with her poems. An avid concertgoer. Whay said she hopes to break into the music business and have some of her poems made into songs.

Rebecca Morphis, junior in theater, uses yet another medium to express her creativity. As a theater major, Morphis uses the characters she portrays to create different personalities. She has acted for most of her life, and said her mom was the one who got her started.

"I actually got started acting because my mom thought I was too shy," Morphis said. "I guess she thought it would make me more social and help me make friends."

During the last 16 years, Morphis has honed her skill, acting in a wide variety of productions and plays.

"When you are on stage, it is up to you to create who and what your character is," Morphis said. "I like having that freedom to make my character mine."

Boyda defeated Ryun, a five-term incumbent congressman from Lawrence, in 2006, despite appearances by President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney to foster his support. Boyda's win was one of the biggest upsets in 2006 as the Democratic party surged back to control of Congress.

But Ryun said he is confident he can win in 2008.

"I'm the first one to admit I ran a lackluster race," Ryun said of the 2006 campaign.

Boyda's spokesman, Thomas Seay, said, "Honestly, 2008 is still a long way away. Our office is focused on serving our constituents, not on politics."

Some suggest Ryun might have trouble overcoming the loss to Boyda.

"Jim is going to have some challenges because he has the baggage of having lost one," said state Sen. Derek Schmidt, R-Independence, who is considering running for the congressional seat.

Because the national and Kansas Republican Party are targeting Boyda for defeat in 2008, other Republicans say they will consider running, even if Ryun tries again.

"I will continue to look at

FBI trying to find whereabouts of former agent missing in Iran

By Pat Milton THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK CITY - An American who disappeared in Iran while on a business trip is a former FBI agent in New York and Florida known as a meticulous investigator and an expert in busting Italian and Russian mobsters.

The retired agent was identified as Robert Levinson, 59, of Coral Springs, Fla., a U.S. official familiar with the case told The Associated Press on Tuesday.

He was last heard from around March 11 while in a coastal area of southern Iran, where he was working for an independent filmmaker, said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the situation. Levinson reportedly was near or on Kish Island, a resort area in the Persian Levinson is an expert on organized crime who sometimes worked 20-hour days, his former colleagues recalled.

Former FBI Director Louis Freeh said he knows Levinson very well and worked with him at the U.S. attorney's office in New York in the late 1970s and at the FBI.

"He distinguished himself, particularly in the area of organized crime," said Freeh, who now runs a legal affairs consulting company. "He is very well respected and is very well liked."

Lewis Schiliro, former FBI assistant director in New York, said Levinson is "one of the most meticulous agents I have ever met."

The former agent had such a remarkable memory he became the go-to guy when FBI colleagues were stumped over identifying a mobster in a

"He always knew who it was," Schiliro said.

Levinson was an agent for the Drug Enforcement Administration before he joined the FBI in 1976. He was assigned to New York, home to five notorious organized-crime families. He transferred to the Miami FBI office in the early 1980s, where he specialized in the Russian mob.

In the House, Majority Leader Ray Merrick derided the measure as a perk for Johnson County elitists seeking funding for their pet projects. He also said the proposal, pushed by the Senate, had no public hearing in his chamber before the House was asked to approve it.

"I don't like how this whole thing's been handled," said Merrick, R-Stilwell. "I think the Senate ought to get serious."

Supporters said voters will not automatically approve tax increases, noting that Johnson County last year rejected a proposal to raise taxes for a massive soccer complex designed to lure the Kansas City Wizards away from Arrowhead Stadium.

"Our people can think for themselves and decide what to do," said Rep. Sue Storm, D-Overland Park. The biggest tax cut under consideration would eliminate the franchise tax, which charges businesses a fee for operating in Kansas. The proposal has enjoyed bipartisan support this session and was sought by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius in her State of the State message.

Lip locks start off Lawrence Pride Week

By Tyler Harbert

UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN (U. KANSAS) LAWRENCE, Kan. - On any other day, couples making out on Wescoe Beach might have been advised to get a room.

But on Monday, sloppy kisses and loving embraces were part of Queers and Allies' Kiss-In event, one of 10 events celebrating Lawrence Pride Week at the University

Only two couples locked lips on and off, but Jonathan Pryor, senior and director of Queers and Allies, said making out with his boyfriend, senior David Ta, Queers and Allies events chair, was a demonstration to promote visibility of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender community.

"Even if it's just two couples, it's activism," Pryor said. "It's no different than straight people holding hands walking down the street."

Another couple, Bethanie White, senior and co-social chair for Queers and Allies, and her girlfriend, senior Ashley Shawgo, said they made out on Wescoe even though they had planned not

"(Members of Queers and Allies) asked us to," White said. "We don't have any problem with PDA, just not as a display."

Queers and Allies members also distributed information to passers-by and sold T-shirts that read, "Gay? Fine by me," to raise money for the Donate Against Hate campaign.

The campaign is a project intended to stop organizations like Fred Phelps' Westboro Baptist Chuch from protesting funerals, said Ryan Campbell, senior and student senator for Queers and Al-

Campbell said Queers and Allies sold more than 100 Tshirts in the past, and that he expects to sell more at some of the upcoming pride week

Sex columnist Dan Savage is giving a lecture tonight at 7:30 at Woodruff Auditorium in the Kansas Union.

"I've read some of Dan Savage's stuff," Pryor said. "He's a very blunt guy, and vulgar, and I think he works well with a college crowd."

There will be a panel discussion at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday at the Kansas Room in the Kansas Union, presented by the Service Members Legal Defense Network regarding the "don't ask, don't tell," military policy, followed by a social event at 10:30 p.m. at Liquid Bar and Nightclub, 804 W. 24th St.

The organization is sponsoring the Queer Awards Banquet at 6:30 p.m. Thursday at Maceli's, 1031 New Hampshire St., which honors people who have contributed to the LGBT community in Lawrence.

The Brown Bag Drag is Friday at noon in front of the Kansas Union, and the week culminates with an AIDS walk, followed by a pride march on Massachusetts Street.

Stephanie Bottoms, senior and Queers and Allies communications director, said the pride march was organized to promote diversity and for the LGBT community to be visible in Lawrence.

"Pride week is a good way for LGBT individuals to celebrate something that usually causes them to be discriminated against," she said.

Admit rates plunge at Ivy League schools

By Jon Meza DAILY PENNSYLVANIAN (U. PENN)

PHILADELPHIA - Ivy League admissions rates are like the limbo - they just keep going lower and lower.

Five other Ivy League schools joined the University of Pennsylvania in admitting the lowest rates of applicants yet, but experts say Penn has the best chance to keep the momentum going.

Harvard, Princeton, Dartmouth, Brown and Columbia universities all joined Penn by accepting record-low percentages of applicants.

Yale University increased by 0.7 percent, and Cornell University has not yet released its admissions data.

Chuck Hughes, president and founder of Road to College and a former Harvard admissions official, said he was impressed with Penn's steadily declining acceptance rate - as recent as five years ago, the rate was at 25 percent - and expected it to continue to drop.

"The reality is that Penn is going through the most decisive decrease (of all the Ivy League schools)," he said.

Penn Dean of Admissions Lee Stetson attributed the steadily falling acceptance rate to the combination of increased yield and the rising number of applications received.

But Hughes believes it is Penn's larger size and urban environment that has made the school increasingly attractive to prospective stu-

"Cornell and Dartmouth always will have to compete with 'I don't want to be in Hanover or Ithaca," he

As for the other Ivies, Harvard, Princeton and Yale accepted under 10 percent of applicants, marking the first time all three schools broke into single digits in the same

But Howard Green, a former Princeton University admissions officer and president of Howard Green and Associates, said he does not expect the decrease to continue because it is much harder to continue to accept such a small percentage of applicants.

"The numbers can't get too much lower," he said.

Another factor to consider is the elimination of early admissions practices by both Harvard and Princeton, beginning next year.

But Green said the change likely will have a negligible effect on Harvard's admissions rates due to its high yield -the measure of how many accepted students matriculate to the school - which hovers at about 80 percent.

Green predicted that Princeton - which usually has a yield of about 70 percent - might not escape the same fate.

"It will not be an enormous surge," he said, "but they may need to admit somewhat more."

Overall, Green said the continuing decreases across the board likely can be attributed to the growing number of students who apply to several top schools - a trend that might be tough on officials during admissions sea-

Schools offer file-sharing services for students

By Andrea Rodi

THE DAILY FREE PRESS (BOSTON U.)

BOSTON - While some universities are forwarding settlement letters from the Recording Industry Association of America to their students for illegally downloading music, others are offering file sharing programs to spare students the risk of facing a lawsuit.

Bentley College began providing the file-sharing program Napster to its students in fall 2005, said Bentley Student Government Association President Mike Caliva.

In its first year, the college funded the Napster subscription, and after the program's initial success, the student government began funding the next year's subscription through a student activity fee.

Sixty percent of Bentley students now use Napster, said Jonathan Everett, Bentley IT Client Services direc-

"I commend the administration for offering a solution with Napster and not just blocking off our connection and saying, 'Tough luck,'" said Caliva, a Bentley junior.

Bentley also has a firewall system that prevents students from illegal peer-to-peer file sharing, Everett said. When students are caught sharing files, they are removed from the college network for about 10 minutes, and the school logs their illegal actions.

"There is a computing code of ethics that every student signs," Everett said. "I couldn't say we've eradicated illegal file sharing completely, but we're headed in the right direction."

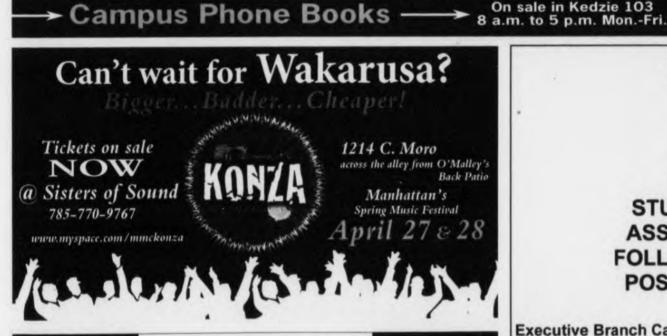

In fall 2006, the University of Washington began providing Cdigix, a free legal downloading program, to students. Its agreement with the university will end June 1 because the company is leaving the business, said Daniel Duffy, Washington Computing and Communications senior man-being on stage made him nervous.

"I can turn my back on an audience when I am conducting, so I don't need to worry," he said.

Walker received his bache-Jor's degree from the University of Nebraska, and then his masher's from Wichita State University. After college, he taught for a year at Central High School in Omaha, Neb.

"One evening a friend of mine called me and told me, I'm leaving this place I'm in; which was K-State, and says, "You want my job?"

This friend was Morris Hays, who Walker said has been a mentor to him, he said. He first met Hays when Walker was in thigh school playing basketball In Scottsbluff, Neb. Later, one If Walker's college teachers in-Iroduced the two.

When Walker first came to K-State, he said his high school choir in Omaha was better than the K-State choir, so he began to rebuild it.

"The program is as strong as the students and the student singers are," he said. "If they're good and they're willing to work, you'll look good. If they're not, you're in trouble. It's what they've done. I couldn't do it without them, or they without me. It's a team effort."

During his time as the director of choral studies, he said it was the "moments of discovery" that kept him going.

"When something happens in rehearsals or in performances that you can't explain, that is just so gorgeous that nothing can wrong with it, with you, your life, the world," he said. "What you create through music and text can be very worthwhile to a person, and I've seen it change kids' lives. It changed

He also said there is talk of starting a K-State alumni choir in Kansas City, and he is lined up to do another concert at Carnegie Hall as a guest conductor in June 2008.

appraisers decide the amount the city must pay for each of these properties," said Frost. "After the second meeting (last night), the ordinance will be published, allowing us to file the eminent domain lawsuit."

Assistant city manager Jason Hilgers said property owners could negotiate contracts with Dial and avoid the eminent domain process.

"Our hope is that everyone will sign contracts, and we can avoid resorting to eminent domain transactions," Hilgers said. "Both parties need to continue to communicate and reach a solution."

Hilgers said the offers from the city were for the properties' market values plus 25 percent and included a relocation plan. He said the eminent domain process would give the market value, but that other details of the price are up to the judge. The remaining property owners can reach a settlement with Dial any time during the eminent domain process, Hilg-Slanary said Art Craft Printers still is negotiating with Dial.

"Signing a contract, for us, is contingent upon finding a suitable relocation site," she said. "We would like a secure place

Slanary said they are working with Dial to buy a suitable property from its current owners. She said though they are working toward a solution, she feels her business could have been compensated more.

"For all of what's being taken from us, I think we could have been compensated even better," Slanary said. "I would have liked to have seen an offer that reflected the revenue we will lose from our tenants, too."

Rick Kiolbasa, partner in Dial Realty, said they are making progress in the negotiations. Dial has signed contracts with 16 of the 23 property owners.

"I think we'll be successful in negotiating contracts with most folks," Kiolbasa said.

Mike Conkwright, owner of Bud's Auto Service, 301 Colorado St., said he is not opposed to the project, but they are waiting for an offer they can accept.

"In the long term, this project will be very good for the Manhattan community," Conkwright said. "We don't want to be against the project. We just feel it should not be at the present business owners' expense."

Conkwright said the offers his family has received have not offered enough to maintain their business.

"We're expected to move to a location that's not as competitive for a one-time price," he said, "but they're going to continue to profit from this deal for a long time?

Conkwright said he and his family would agree to a contract with a new site for their business, provided the site is acceptable and relocation costs are included.

"This is a third-generation business that my family has owned for more than 50 years," he said. "We have to have an offer that allows us to continue our way of life."

City commissioner Ed Klimek said the commission's intent is to treat the property owners fairly in the purchase of the properties and assisting them in relocation.

"Businesses in the redevelopment district need to be able to stay in business if they want to do so," Klimek said. "We need to make sure we're giving them a fair offer. At the same time, there is a limit to what the city and Dial can pay."

Klimek said he has spoken with the majority of owners in the district and understands what they need.

"The city commissioners are the policy makers, not the negotiators," he said. "We pass on what we find out to the negotiating team, and if we don't feel the offer is fair, we can step in and say, 'Hey, you need to go a little further."

commission by a significant margin. This will be Strawn's first term on the commission and the fourth for Snead, who is Manhattan's mayor.

Snead said he was "gratified and humbled" by the results and was optimistic about the prospect of a fourth term as mayor. He thanked voters and his wife Leslie for their support.

Strawn said he will hold back at first before working on the issues in his campaign platform.

"It's important for me to sit back and learn from my peers," he said. "It would be wrong for me to jump in and try to be an avatollah."

Traditionally the mayor position has gone to each four-year term commissioner in order of election.

"I've run lots of companies bigger than the city of Manhattan, so hopefully when the time comes, I'll be up to the task," he said.

Colburn said. "I wanted to get the results sooner than if I had waited for them to show up somewhere else.

He said he had kept himself busy all day and felt optimistic about the results as well as his overall campaign.

"The best part about it was meeting the other candidates," Colburn said.

Bob Strawn, running for a seat on the city commission, was the last candidate to join the crowd. He looked relaxed and laughed easily.

"Too much work has gone into this for me to feel nervous," he said. "I ran hard, and that's what's important to me. In the end, I feel like I've already won. It's a lot more fun winning than losing."

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Tommy the Clown, Lil' Tight Eyes, Rocco, Casper and Larry dance together as Larry is introduced to the crowd during a performance Tuesday evening in Forum Hall. The show was about the dance movement started by Tommy the Clown.

Former convict delivers positive message through dance, hip-hop music

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From convict to krumper, Tommy the Clown combined his passions for hip-hop, dance and performance to create a worldwide movement.

The evening began with the presentation of the movie "Rize." The movie, based in Southern Los Angeles, details the rise of the dance sensation known as krumping. Tommy the Clown, born Thomas Johnson, began the movement in 1992 after a friend asked him to be a birthday party clown.

Johnson expressed hesitation but agreed to be the clown at the party. The rush of performing his first show was enough to have him hooked for good. Johnson used the positive experience from his first party and looked for ways he could continue working.

After spending five years in jail on drug charges, Johnson realized he needed to make a lifestyle change. To get where he is now, Johnson said he drove around in his car after work looking for people for whom he could

"I got off of work at 3:45, then I would put my makeup on and drive around neighborhoods looking for groups of people to perform for," John-

He went on to say he would hand his cards out to the people, and they called him to perform at parties.

As he kept performing, other ple took notice, giving birth to the movement he started.

"I don't want kids to let the 'struggle' get them down," Johnson said. "I want them to know that they can use dance to rise above it."

The first clown dancer who danced onto stage was Lil' Tight Eyes. As the crowd cheered, Tight Eyes began to show examples of the dance moves that brought him to K-State. Following Lil' Bright Eyes onto the stage was Casper, Rocco - the airbrush artist for the group - and Larry.

When the respective dancers were called onto the stage, they were given a few minutes to dance. When a new dancer came on stage, the dancers that were already out danced with them, drawing shouts of admiration and excitement from the crowd.

Many students attended to see the show and Tommy and his clowns, and some were not sure what to expect.

Kyle Spencer, junior in hotel and restaurant management, arrived at the show with an open mind.

"I have no idea about him, and I have never seen the movie," said

Amanda Collier, junior in sociology, said a teacher encouraged her to attend.

"I thought that it was a very interesting show," Collier said. "You only hear the bad stories about the area that they came from, and it is neat to see something positive."

Madonna's H&M line shows star's new sophisticated style

Material Girl? She certainly is. Madonna, the multi-Grammy Award-winning cultural phenomenon, has teamed up with Margareta van den Bosch, head designer for the international retail giant H&M, to create her very own clothing line, "M," which premiered in the United States on March 22. "Madonna has an impressive feel for fashion and trends," van den Bosch said in an H&M press release. "She was extraordinarily style-conscious, passionate and was involved in even the smallest details of every design. There is no doubt that Madonna's influence is reflected by the 'M' by Madonna line."

I will admit, I do not consider myself much of a Madonna fan, but I have absolutely fallen in love with

Have you ever

"M." If you have seen the singer recently, you can tell she has come a long way from her pointy bra, barelythere threads of the last couple decades. Her new, sophisticated look is reflected in her line with crisp collars, skinny pencil skirts, feminine-draped dresses and classic cinch belts. With friendly fabrics, the line is something all of us non-Orange County women can afford to wear.

Madonna has said she wanted her line to be casual but naughty, sensible but sexy. 'That's me," she said in a press release. "That's how I am. I wanted the collection to be for a working girl. This is a combination of outfits I would love to wear. Bits and pieces have been inspired by the outfits in my own wardrobe, and also by what I

No doubt. You can see her inspiration projected into the suits, skirts and sweaters Audrey Hepburn might wear, as well as the Asian-inspired dresses - kimono-style and floralprinted - sporty jumpsuits and metallic touches.

Essentially, Madonna's line has three parts: the lights, the darks and the accessories. Almost every piece is a black, white or beige tone, but with sharp tailoring. No item is dull or uninspiring.

Among my favorites are the black waist-high, knee-length pencil skirt; the white-fitted trench coat with a belt that falls just below mid-thigh; and the T-shirt style dress covered in white sequins with streaks of silver and gold detailing - quite stunning.

The "M" accessory collection also includes chunky pumps, oversized and clutch handbags, thick belts and a bizarre, 1920s style turban hat.

You can visit hm.com and view it for yourself, or to take a road trip to St. Louis where the closest H&M store is located. Sure, it might be a six-hour drive, but in my opinion, it's Unfortunately, you cannot shop directly from the H&M Web site, but you can find a lot of pieces from the "M" line on eBay.

The Material Girl's look has matured during the last 20 years to a style that is elegant and tres chic. Yet you can still find her '80s influence within "M" through a black, capsleeved leotard like the purple leo the icon donned for her "Confessions"

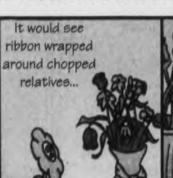

I guess some fashion disasters just never die.

Easter treats, dyed eggs bring color to Sunday celebration

By Lacey D. Mackey | KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Easter Sunday is a day for faith and reflection, but through the years, certain traditions have become associated with the holiday - including decorating eggs.

According to homecooking.about.com, Peggy Trowbridge Filippone, a writer and food-service industry professional, writes that the decoration of Easter eggs became an art centuries ago. Dyes came from vegetables, edible flowers, fruits, tea, leaves, bark and roots to color the eggs. Eggs are decorated in different ways in various parts of the world.

The types of decorations include the Macedonian tradition of etching - layering wax into a design; krashanky - dyeing eggs solid colors, often red to symbolize Christ's shed blood; fabergé - covering eggs with jewels and precious metals, a technique created by a Russian jeweler in the 1800s; and calico or madras - wrapping eggs in cloth and boiling them.

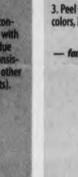

Here are a couple of easy ways to create your own colorful Easter eggs.

Easter celebrated with church, family meals, egg-hunting traditions

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Easter, a holiday with great significance to many Christians, has been celebrated for 2,000 years. The holiday is a time to reflect on the death and crucifixion of Jesus Christ and to celebrate with other traditions.

According to the Bible, the resurrection of Jesus marks his defeat of death and symbolizes the atonement for the sins of humankind. Before Iesus' death, the only way people of Jewish faith believed they could be forgiven from sin was to sacrifice a spotless animal. This sacrifice was called a "scapegoat." The most commonly used animal was a lamb to signify innocence.

Jesus, who often is referred to as the "Lamb of God," took the sins of the people of the world upon himself and was sacrificed to atone for sins. Three days after his death, the Bible tells of Jesus' resurrection, conquering death and Satan, and providing a way for people to go to Whether people choose to celebrate or not, the day has significance for all of Christendom. Like Christmas, Easter has lost much of its spiritual meaning to some, while others use the day to spend time with family.

Although it has been celebrated for two millennia, many traditions have remained unchanged.

Father Keith Weber, chaplain of St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, has been a clergyman for 24 years and said he has not seen any marked changes in the way people celebrate.

"There many who see this day, like Christmas, a day where church attendance is mandatory," Weber said.

Weber said the most important part to him is the salvation that comes through Jesus Christ. To celebrate the holiday, Weber said he usually spends the day with his family after he has celebrated the morning masses.

David Jones, campus pastor for the Ecumenical Campus Ministries, said the only change he has seen in the celebration of Easter is that people are dressing more and more casually than in previous years. Jones said the way Easter is observed has not changed much since he has been involved in the church.

Although many spend Easter morning in church, the afternoon often is reserved for family.

Stacy Lutz, junior in apparel marketing and business, said she has many fond memories of Easter afternoons with family. Lutz said each member of the family usually brings over a dish, and there is a large meal when everyone arrives.

ETS cancels proposed GRE changes

By Mike Kelly KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who anticipate applying to graduate school had a scare this week regarding a proposed change to graduate record examination.

The Educational Testing Service cancelled plans to launch a revised Graduate Record Exam on Monday, instead maintaining the test's current GRE officials said the decision was based on the belief that problems guaranteeing complete access to the new Internet-based test outweighed the benefits of immediately moving to the proposed format.

"The decision to cancel the revised GRE General Test best serves the interests of test takers and the graduate institutions that use those scores to make admissions decisions," said David Payne, Executive Director of the GRE Program at ETS.

"After much debate and evaluation, it became clear that the current format offers students more convenient and flexible opportunities to test when and where they choose, while still providing score users with Jackie Antonio Duncan Ir., 19, Lawton, Okla., was arrested about 2:30 p.m. Tuesday in the area of Sixth and Colorado streets after RCPD confirmed the tip.

Duncan is a suspect in the first-degree murder of Quinton Pritchett, 19,

According to a news release from the Lawton Police Department, Duncan and a group of people planned to meet up with Pritchett and other individuals for a gang-related fist fight Feb. 2, 2007, in Lawton.

When Duncan met up with Pritchett, Duncan allegedly exited his vehicle and shot Pritchett once in the head with a semi-automatic hand gun, according to the release. Members of Pritchett's group started to flee when they came under fire by passengers in a pick-up truck that accompanied Duncan's vehicle to the scene, according to the release. Duncan fled the scene.

A Manhattan resident identified Duncan and informed the RCPD on Sunday.

Duncan was held on a $1 million bond until he was transported back to Oklahoma on Wednesday. An arraignment in the Comanche County District Court will be today.

Award-winning Kansas poet bases work on life experience

By Kristen Roderick KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A poet who has earned a Guggenheim Foundation Fellowship said he uses the stories of his life as inspiration.

Kevin Young, who grew up in Topeka, presented many of his poems in a melodic voice Wednesday evening in K-State Student Union Ball-

He presented poetry from his latest book, "For the Confederate Dead." The book was published earlier this year.

"I wanted to get at history with the South and their losses," Young said. "I was also trying to reclaim the word 'confederate' and bring it back to the original meaning.

One of the poems he recited was "The Ballad of Jim Crow.'

"It's fun because you get to have people like the snitch, hack, mob boss and killer," he said. "The killer kept haunting me in my dreams like he does in the book."

Young said he wanted Crow to be a legend in his poems. He presented one poem comparing Crow and his experiences to those of Jesus.

Most of the poems Young recited were tales of his own life. He said the poem "April in Paris" was about his time with his father in Paris, where they saw jazz musician Lionel Hampton's last performance.

When I saw him, he was in his mid-'90s," he said. "He could play very few notes, but they were always the right ones."

Another musician Young has written about is Johnny Cash. Young was going to Las Vegas when Cash died, so he wrote the poem for Cash and titled it "Walk the Line."

"It's about going to Las Vegas," Young said. "It isn't really a Johnny Cash town, but he died before I went there. But because of Las Vegas laws, I can't tell you what happened there.'

Young has won a Stegner Fellowship in poetry at Stanford University, a MacDowell Colony Fellowship and a National Education Association Fellowship, according to www.poets.org.

Audience members said they appreciated Young's

"He is an important presence to contemporary poetry," said Elizabeth Dodd, professor of English.

Young, an Atticus Haygood professor of English and creative writing at Emory University in Atlanta, said coming to Manhattan was a homecoming for him because he used to attend writing conventions here in the summer.

Young ended the night with humorous odes to his favorite foods, including pork, grains and chitlins.

"These last few poems are odes to everyday things," he said. "Well, more to food, or Cristin Canaday, sophomore in secondary education and art, said her favorite part of the night was the odes.

"I liked his funny poems the best," she said.

During the month of April, K-State students will have the opportunity to learn more about food safety.

The Department of Hotel, Restaurant, Institution Management and Dietetics at K-State and the U.S. Department of Agriculture will sponsor a variety of events throughout April as part of Food Safety Month at K-

"One of the main things is that college students as a whole do not have food safety practices at home," said Kevin Roberts, instructor of hotel and restaurant management.

Food Safety Month will feature several displays in the K-State Student Union and Peters Recreation Complex.

"This week we have the hand-washing stations in the Union during the lunch hour and at the rec center in the evenings," Roberts said.

Jessica Golden, senior in hotel and restaurant management, was one of the students running the hand-washing stations.

"We are teaching students how important it is to wash your hands by showing them the germs that stay on your hands after you wash them," Golden said.

On April 11, there is a hamburger cookout at Justin Hall that will encourage students to use thermometers to check if a burger is done, Roberts said. "Most students will just look at (the burger) to check to see if

Criminal 'confessions'

Detainment of British soldiers in Iran suspicious, reminiscent of 1979

The Middle East has pulled some crazy shenanigans in the past, oh, forever. The most recent act, however, has left me pondering just how clueless they think

According to CNN.com, Iranian officials detained 15 British soldiers on March 23. The Iranian government claims the crew was in its waters and was spotted while Iranian Revolutionary Guards were patrolling for smugglers.

Just yesterday however, Iran announced it has pardoned these hostages and will be releasing them to the British embassy today. Many issues are still a little eyebrow-raising to me, though.

First of all, it seems a little questionable just whether or not these soldiers really were in Iranian waters. They were found near the mouth of a waterway called the Shatt al-Arab, which CNN said has long been a disputed dividing line between Iraq and Iran.

Were the British soldiers where they shouldn't have been? Perhaps. Or, perhaps it is just a way for an inferior-feeling country to stand up to the bullies of the West.

I've also raised an eyebrow or two at the announcement of "confessions." According to the CNN Web site, last Monday an Iranian state-run TV station said all 15 of the British soldiers had confessed to entering Iranian waters illegally. Once again, maybe they did. I wasn't there. However, the suspicious part to me is that an Iranian, state-run TV station said the rest of the world would not have the pleasure of hearing these "confessions" because of "positive changes" in Britain's negotiating stance. They did not, unfortunately, choose to go into more detail on just what exactly these changes were. I, along with a few others in this world, choose to believe these confessions do not exist. I am not so sure the Iranian government would just choose to keep that tape in its personal library to watch while eating popcorn at night. If they had it, they just might have shown it.

But, for the sake of argument, say these taped confessions really do exist. If it were me in the position of those soldiers, and I had a meanlooking guy pointing a gun at me behind the camera, he could probably get me to say just about whatever he wanted, including, perhaps, confessions that maybe were more than just a little forced.

Now that these British soldiers are set to head back, some might think these issues no longer really matter. I beg to differ. Fox News reported yesterday that Iran said the British government wasn't "big enough to admit their mistakes," which sounds like nothing ever was "confessed" in the first place.

The Iranian government taking hostages is not exactly a shockingly new situation. In November 1979, Iranian militants overran the American Embassy in Tehran and made its employees captives. Many believe this was in response to a feeling of rabid anti-Americanism. Is this really that different? This could just be an aftershock to an act of terrorism that took place almost 30 years ago.

All I know is that the situation is just a little fishy. Speaking of fish, maybe that's what we should do. Ask the fish in that waterway what happened - they might have a slightly different view of that day.

Possession of marijuana a lesser offense than assault, rape

Staff editorial

THE DIAMONDBACK (U. MARYLAND)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. - We hope the Student Governing Association votes to symbolically support reducing marijuana penalties in a vote tonight, but no matter the result, the issue will be far from over.

Students found in possession of marijuana in an on-campus residence are in an A-level violation of residence hall rules, essentially equating marijuana possession with offenses like arson, assault and rape. Firsttime offenders probably will face suspension and expulsion from housing.

Financial penalties often follow. Student lobbying has reasonably focused not on the legality of marijuana but the fairness of punishment. Campus groups are lobbying to reduce possession of small amounts of marijuana to a B-level offense accompanied by far more proportionate punishments.

The legal system considers rape and assault to be felonies and possession of small amounts of marijuana to be a misdemeanor. This is an absurd disconnect between the norms of society as reflected in our legal system and university policy.

A majority of students are in support: 65 percent of students voted to loosen marijuana punishments in a non-binding referendum last year. All eyes now turn to Resident Life. They should not rationalize away reasons why an injustice is being perpetuated and should instead correct it. Marijuana possession is not rape, assault or arson, and the university should no longer treat it as such.

ETS shouldn't have changed plans so close to test date

It was a big mistake for the Educational Testing Service to change its plans to revamp the Graduate Record Exam format.

The test, required of all students who want to attend graduate school, is computerized.

The test questions get harder as the test taker answers them correctly and less difficult as they respond incorrectly.

Therefore, not all test takers receive the same ques-

The service's changes would have included a linear test format similar to other standardized tests like the SAT and ACT.

The new version of the test would have been more fair to all students.

Using the current format, an answer - correct or incorrect - may be a fluke and not indicative of the test taker's actual comprehension, and it could skew the entire outcome of the test.

By keeping everyone on the same playing field, it seems the test also would be more accurate.

Aside from making the results more difficult to analyze, however, the testing service's last-minute decision to renege may make it difficult for some students to prepare for the test, further affecting the testing process.

Many go-getting, wouldbe grad students who planned to take the test in September, when the new format would have been introduced, may have to change their study strategies now that the test format will not be changed.

If the testing service was so cavalier in changing its policy, perhaps the logic behind it isn't terribly solid to begin with. And what's preventing the Educational Testing Service from having drastic changes of heart in the future?

Its indecision is likely to hurt students, as well as its own reputation, in the

All's fair in reuniting with exes

If Pat Benatar was right and love is a battlefield, are there ever peace treaties?

We've all dodged landmines in our own war zones. We've tossed out love notes: we've canceled Facebook. com relationships; we've even avoided areas of campus that have been declared hostile territory.

NELSON

Still, we Americans once considered the English to be the vilest of enemies, and that eventually grew into a pleasant enough alliance. Certainly we could apply these principles to our own personal relations.

At least it's tempting to think so. After all, you and your ex were friendly enough while you were dating. You were there for each other through all the typical rough patches, you shared inside jokes and intimate moments, and you argued heatedly about whether or not Ross and Rachel were on a break

We'd all like to think we can divorce romance from the whole thing and salvage all the worthwhile moments.

But that's where things get dodgy, as it's difficult to know where you. are going to draw the line. Everybody knows that one couple who managed to make it work, sure. But it's very rare for most couples to make it through the entire cycle of love, war, and then, friendship.

Unless you and your ex were solid friends before you dated, you might now consider your relationship the biggest mistake since you enrolled in advanced physics. Even if you were friends, things are never easy at first. Either way, you've got your work cut out for you. All it takes is one night in Aggieville to blow your tentative peace talks immediately and violently out of the water. One blurted, drunken statement could launch your respective sides into war all over again.

One thing that always seems to crop up in peace talks is grievances. There is a victor, there is a loser, and there are bruises that run deep. This is the area of the budding friendship where your diplomatic skills will truly be tested.

If you thought getting your mother to forget the "D" you got freshman year was tough, you've obviously never tried to befriend your ex. After the World Wars, there were grievances heard, contracts drawn up and reparations made. Do not think for a second that you are going to become real friends with the former love of your life without going through this

If you can make it past the endless bouts of, "No, I still don't know where your high school football jersey went to," and, "Remember that time you forgot that my favorite TV show was Fraggle Rock?" you've officially impressed me. Clearly your negotiation skills far surpass mine.

I'm not trying to say the task of befriending an ex is completely impossible. Once you get past the initial torturous awkwardness, things can go well. Though I'm sure most would agree that the bulk of exes are about as mature and worthwhile as Bill O'Reilly, there will always be one or two that you want to keep around.

In the end, retaining a friendship with an ex is difficult and painful, but at times, infinitely rewarding. However, do keep in mind the ultimate, time-worn truth of going from ex to friend: once you do finally get to a place where you don't drive each other crazy, your ex is absolutely guaranteed to get a phenomenally attractive roommate. Consider yourself warned, and remember to wear a helmet. All is fair in love and war.

DAMASCUS, Syria House Speaker Nancy Pelosi challenged the White House on Middle East policy Wednesday, meeting with Syria's leader and insisting "the road to Damascus is a road to peace."

That brought a sharp attack from the Bush administration, which has rejected direct talks with Damascus until its changes its ways.

"Unfortunately that road is lined with the victims of Hamas and Hezbollah, the victims of terrorists who cross from Syria into Iraq," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for President Bush's National Security Council. "It's unfortunate that she took this unilateral trip which we only see as counterproductive."

BRUSSELS, Belgium Scientists and diplomats from more than 120 countries debated the urgency of changes in the Earth's climate Wednesday as they tried to finalize a report on global warming that will guide policymakers for decades to come.

In closed-door meetings, the delegates argued over revisions in the 21-page draft text, in one case making changes to highlight how global warming will reduce staple crops in countries such as China and India, where millions of people could go hungry.

The conference is due to release the report by Friday. The text is a synopsis of a more than 1,400-page assessment by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, with contributions by more than 1,000 climate experts, on the impact of global warming and the vulnerabilities of economies, ecosystems and human health.

BAGHDAD Heavily armed gunmen on Wednesday abducted 22 Shiite shepherds who were tending thousands of sheep and had wandered into a dangerous Sunni area west of Baghdad, while six powerplant workers were gunned down in northern Iraq.

The attacks reflected the spread of sectarian violence outside Baghdad as violence declines in the capital, where a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown is in its eighth week. In all, at least 34 people were killed or found dead in Iraq on Wednesday, including the six Sunni Arab men killed in an ambush near the oil-rich northern city of Kirkuk.

I am writing in regard to the opinion article on cell phones and children on April 3, 2007. Adrianne De-Weese, thank goodness for someone with a little sanity in the cell phone world.

I thoroughly agree; cell phones should not be given to children for (the reason usually given) "safety's sake." The overuse and abuse of cell phones that were only to be used for this purpose defies imagination.

And how disruptive in class.

Political satire requires wit, not randomness

Editor,

If you would be so kind, please suggest to Brett King that he should no longer daydream about politics during mass - it makes for poor writing.

In today's fast moving political climate, it's a bit behind the times to poke fun at a public figure who left office more than six years ago (Janet Reno).

Johnnie Cochran isn't exactly current either.

Does he intend to liken the Passion of the Christ to the O.J. Simpson trial? Is he really comparing Christ's capture at Gethsemane to the last days of the cult of David Koresh? Does he in fact see Tom Delay and Scooter Libby as martyrs. unjustly murdered by the tyranny of the American Civil Liberties Union?

I can't figure out whether it's the ACLU or the Religious Right that he's attempting to lampoon; the only one who appears ridiculous is he.

Biting political satire ought to possess both wit and relevance. King demonstrates neither.

Awareness of one's sin is freeing, not confining

Editor.

In the March 30 Collegian, Scott Girard once again ventures into controversial and delicate territory. In his article on sin, Girard demonstrates he has been misinformed on the nuances of sin and Christianity. Girard flogs a decidedly dead horse with the age-old argument that morals and law are social constructs and should be applied only within the confines of the devout's inner sanctum.

Let me join him in beating my own dead horse for a moment. The doctrine of sin is not meant to encourage good behavior - quite the oppo-

It is meant to show good behavior is useless, and only the interposition of a savior could possibly bridge the gap, created by sin, between God and man.

True Christians do not attempt to make anyone follow rules that have no virtue of their own. They point other beggars to the same place where they themselves found bread - Jesus Christ.

The awareness of sin is not a cloud hanging over Christians' heads but a constant reminder of how much we have been forgiven. It is freeing, not confining.

Finally, let me observe that Girard's entire article is a moral judgment, an absolute statement of what is right and what is wrong. Such strong opinions are a great asset to an aspiring journalist, I would think. Such staunch relativists should take care not to be consistent, however, lest they write themselves out of a job.

Gators choose a dynasty over dollars

Greg Oden and Kevin Durant could learn a lot from the four Florida juniors who returned for another

Corey Brewer, Taurean Green, Al Horford and Joakim Noah easily could have bolted to the NBA last year after winning their first national title. However, they all chose to put off the spotlight of the NBA and return for their junior years, but it was not because they hate million-dollar contracts; they stayed because they wanted something more.

They wanted a legacy. By beating Ohio State, 84-75, Monday night, the Gators became the fifth university since 1952 to win back-to-back national titles. The last team with repeat victories was Duke in 1991-92.

But after Christian Laettner broke the hearts of Kentucky fans everywhere in '92 with one of the most famous buzzer beaters of all time, the landscape of college basketball changed. Suddenly there was something wrong with a player who turned down the NBA for another shot at a national title. It was smart to get your money while you could. Players stopped caring about being a part of something bigger.

This new mentality left the NBA littered with hordes of underdeveloped players who could have benefited from an extra year or two of college ball.

This year, some analysts predict as many as five freshmen will be chosen in the top 10 picks of the NBA Draft. However, even Durant and Oden, two of the most dominant players, still have room for improvement.

But the Florida four didn't just stay to sharpen their games. More than anything, they stayed for each other. The mentality of the group has been, "If one of us stays, we all stay. If one of us leaves, we all leave."

You might despise Florida because they dominate both football and basketball. You might hate Noah's outlandish antics or that ridiculous video of him dancing and Gator clapping after Florida won the Southeastern Conference Championship.

Still, you have to admit that there is a lot right with this Gator squad.

Florida became the first team to win back-to-back national championships with the same starting five. All five starters averaged double figures in points, and no one averaged more than 10 shots per game.

The Gators also solidified their spot in college hoops history. Had they all left last year and never won a second title, there's a good chance they would have been forgotten after a few years. Instead, they stuck around and became one of the best teams in college basketball history.

But unfortunately, with the ruling that players must be one year removed from high school before they can play in the NBA, teams like Florida will continue to become a dying breed. The rule will introduce a new type of player: the kind of player who wants to market himself and use his university for one year.

For a perfect example of this new player, look no further than Southern California's O.J. Mayo. Mayo, who is one of the top high school players in the nation, chose USC because he felt the Los Angeles market was the best area in which to gain exposure before heading to the NBA.

And that's the problem. College shouldn't just be some place you go while you're waiting for a better opportunity.

More college players should be like the Gators. Whether they stay another year (which is highly unlikely) or head to the NBA, it's clear that they made the right decision by trading seven-figure paychecks for a dynasty.

Will Bob Huggins be LEAVING SO SOON?

Rumors have been swirling about whether basketball coach Bob Huggins will remain loyal to K-State or return home to his alma mater, West Virginia. At press time, no official statement had been made. Here's a breakdown of his reasons to stay or go.

REASONS TO STAY

The players
How could Huggins possibly turn his back on what is probably the best recruiting class of his 24-year coaching career? His top recruit, Michael Beasley of Notre Dame Prep School in Fitchburg, Mass., is rated No. 1 overall by Rivals.com and earned Most Valuable Player honors in last week's McDonald's All-American Game.

Huggins also is responsible for bringing players such as Bill Walker and Jason Bennett to Manhattan. It would be difficult for him to leave all those players behind.

Loyalty

After Huggins' year off following his resignation at Cincinnati, many schools were hesitant to take a chance on the controversial coach. That was until K-State Athletics Director Tim Weiser decided to pursue ns, following a thorough background check and a meeting with the NCAA offices in Indianapolis.

"We wanted to find somebody that was going to take our program to the level all of us expect it to be,"Weiser told The Kansas City Star in

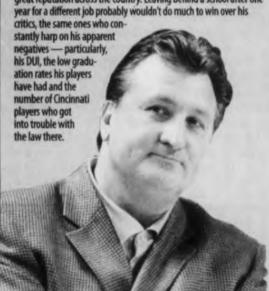

One would think Weiser made the hire assuming Huggins would stay for the duration of his five-year contract and would pledge some loyalty to the university that gave him a second chance.

Huggins said early in the season that he didn't like playing to an empty crowd, and K-State fans responded by selling out Bramlage Coliseum numerous times and providing the Wildcats with one of the best home-court advantages in the Big 12 Conference.
In addition, fans had planned on holing a rally Wednesday at 4:30 p.m. at Bramlage in support of Huggins, but the rally was canceled for unknown reasons. Suffice it to say fans have embraced Huggins since the day he arrived and will likely give him their undying support for remainder of his tenure

Local aftermath

Outside his Manhattan fan base, Huggins doesn't exactly have a great reputation across the country. Leaving behind a school after one year for a different job probably wouldn't do much to win over his

REASONS TO LEAVE

Hometown advantage

Huggins was born in Morgantown, W.Va., and at age 53, he's probably taking his final ride as a collegiate coach. Finishing up at West Virginia has to be an opportunity that interests him. After all, he did consider taking the job once before, back in 2002. "Like any other player who played at a major institution who then got into coaching... I've always dreamed about coaching West Virginia," Huggins told ESPN.com on March 25, 2002. "It's my alma mater. I love the place. I love West Virginia University."

my alma mater. I love the place. I love West Virginia University and love the people there.

Huggins played basketball at the school, graduated magna cum laude and was a graduate assistant coach in 1977-78.

NIT Championship

Taking over the Mountaineers wouldn't exactly be a total rebuilding project for Huggins. West Virginia won the National Invitation Tournament championship last week and has several players returning from a team that finished 27-9.

Plus, the school has something in common with K-State. Much like the Wildcats, West Virginia felt it was snubbed by not making it into the 65-team NCAA Tournament field despite a 9-7 record in the Big East Conference.

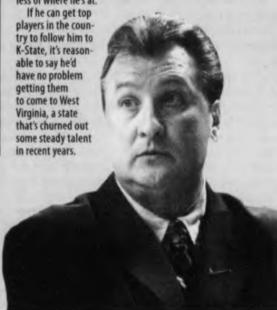

Better paycheck

West Virginia was prepared to offer former head coach John Beilein up to $1.3 million annually before he accepted the Michigan coaching vacancy, according to the Charleston Daily Mail.

Huggins' salary last season was $800,000, and he's one of the lowest-paid coaches in the Big 12. Perhaps K-State will have to up the ante, because it's clear that West Virginia has some wiggle room financially to make him a decent offer.

Easy recruiting

If Huggins has proved anything since arriving in Manhattan, it's that he can recruit high-profile high school players, regardless of where he's at.

Team snaps 10-match losing streak

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State swept Iowa State in doubles, and four of its six singles players posted wins en route to a 5-2 victory over the Cyclones Wednesday, K-State's first win in 11 matches.

K-State (3-11, 1-4 Big 12 Conference) started the day off strong with a doubles sweep over the Cyclones (5-7, 0-6 Big 12). Juniors Viviana Yrureta and Fernanda Da Valle beat Kara Hickey and Eve Soriano, 8-3; junior Olga Klimova and sophomore Katerina Kudlackova beat Jill Palen and Caitlin Loprinzi, 8-1; and junior Tamar Kvaratskhelia and freshman Natasha Vieira beat Chrissy Derouin and Alyssa Palen, 8-3.

"We had a good start in the doubles," said coach Steve Bietau. "I think the difference was we weren't under the same kind of pressure. Most of the recent matches, if we made a mistake, we paid a big penalty for it."

The top three singles players were victorious. Yrureta defeated Jill Palen at No. 1 singles 6-1, 6-1, Da Valle defeated Hickey 6-1, 7-5, and Kvaratskhelia defeated Loprinzi 6-4, 6-3. The other Wildcat to come out on top in singles was Klimova, who defeated Iowa State's Danielle Uscinski 6-4, 3-6, 6-1 at No. 5 singles.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Vivian Yrureta returns a volley earlier this season. K-State ended its 10-match losing streak by beating Iowa State 5-2 on Wednesday.

"In Olga's match, when she kept and I was pleased to see them play the the ball in play and didn't make unforced errors, she was good," Bietau said. "When she made a lot of errors, she wasn't able to control the match."

Kudlackova fell to Alyssa Palen 6-3, 6-4 at No. 4 singles, and Vieira lost at No. 6 singles to Soriano 3-6, 7-5, 1-0 (14-12).

Overall, Bietau said he was happy with the team's performance.

"I'm pleased to get a win," he said. "I was happy to play somewhat clean, way they did. I just want us to keep playing better."

K-State returns for its first home match since March 10 on Saturday, when Texas Tech will visit Manhat-

K-State will play outside at the Peters Recreation Complex tennis courts if the temperature is more than 50 degrees and the wind is less than 20 mph. Otherwise, the matches will be in Ahearn Field House

1-MINUTE DRILL

Staff reports

BBC | K-State reschedules baseball series with Tigers

The K-State baseball team's three-game series with Missouri has been rescheduled, according to a press release from the K-State athletics department.

Because of a threat of inclement weather Thursday evening, the series, originally scheduled to take place Thursday, Friday and Saturday, will now take place Friday, Saturday and Sunday at Tointon Family Stadium.

The game times have also changed. The games will be Friday at 3 p.m., Saturday at 2 p.m. and Sunday at 1 p.m.

The games could be tightly contested due to K-State's (21-8, 3-3 Big 12 Conference) and Missouri's (22-8, 4-2 Big 12) similar seasons thus far. A series sweep for either team would likely allow it to break into the top 30 of the USA Today/ESPN Coaches Poll rankings.

Both teams enter the series having won two in a row.

BKC | Donovan remains quiet about Kentucky

Billy Donovan finally spoke up about a job

Speaking before a fund-raising dinner at Marshall University on Wednesday night, the Florida coach said he needs time to decompress following the Gators' second straight national championship, though he endorsed current Florida assistant head coach Donnie Jones for the head coaching job at Marshall.

"I think Donnie's ready," said Donovan, who coached at Marshall from 1994 to 1996 before moving on to Florida

Donovan remains uncertain about his future. He said he hasn't been contacted about the Kentucky job since leaving the Georgia Dome after Florida beat Ohio State Monday night. Donovan was the featured speaker at the university's annual Big Green Foundation Dinner at the Cam Henderson Center.

Donovan said he spoke as a favor to the school, which had asked him several times over the last few years to speak at the fundraising event. When he booked the engagement, he probably didn't anticipate the reception he received during the news conference.

The center's media parking lot was filled with satellite trucks from as far away as Louisville, three hours to the west, and the press room was packed with double the normal turnout for the dinner's featured

Most of the media wanted answers about Donovan's future, but two days following Florida's historic win, Donovan said he'll take his time before addressing the road ahead.

"I haven't had a lot of time to think about myself or what I want to do," Donovan said. "There'll be a time and place for that. This is not the time and place. This is about Marshall."

The answers may have to wait awhile. Donovan said he's planning to meet with Florida athletic director Jeremy Foley on Thursday to talk. An on-campus celebration is scheduled at the O'Connell Center on Friday, and on Saturday, Donovan and his family will leave for vacation in the Dominican Republic.

BKC | Colorado hires Bzdelik to replace Patton

BOULDER, Colo. — A fading, mostly empty arena. The likes of Bob Knight and Bill Self to compete against on the hardwood and along the recruiting trail. A program with no real history of success or much support.

Bring it all on, declared Jeff Bzdelik. He left Air Force to take over as basketball coach at the University of Colorado on Wednesday, the latest in a series of career challenges he's undertaken up and down the Rocky Mountain front range.

"I get excited by great, great challenges," said Bzdelik, who was 50-16 at Air Force after a 2 1/2-year stint as coach of the Denver Nuggets, whom he led to the playoffs for the first time in a decade in 2004.

Similarly, he was admonished not to schedule heavyweights at Air Force, warnings that only drove him to do exactly that, and the Falcons flourished.

Now comes his biggest challenge yet. "Maybe we can't turn it around," Bzdelik said. "Maybe I don't (succeed). Maybe I fail. But I want to try."

The 54-year-old Bzdelik replaces Ricardo Patton, who went 7-20 in his 11th and final season in Boulder.

In his first season at Air Force, Bzdelik led the Falcons to the best record (24-7) in the program's 50-year history and an NCAA tournament bid. This year, they won a school-record 26 games and reached the NIT semifinals.

Bzdelik signed a five-year deal worth $750,000 annually plus incentives. Athletic director Mike Bohn also promised him that the school would seek funding to build a new practice facility next to the basketball arena.

GRE | Proposed test changes not made; test to remain in same format

valid predictors of test takers' preparedness for graduate school study.

ETS originally planned to launch the revised test worldwide in September.

Instead, it will continue to offer the exam in its current computer-based, continuous testing format.

Payne said the primary reason for canceling the launch was test-taker access.

New plans called for the test to be delivered over a new worldwide network of 3,200 Internet-based testing centers. As the launch approached, ETS officials determined they could not guarantee complete access to all students.

"While the graduate community supports, and in fact helped develop and pilot the revised GRE General Test, they have also stated that they are satisfied with the current GRE General Test, until such time as improvements can be gradually implemented," Payne said.

The current version of the GRE is computer-adaptive, starting test takers with a midrange difficulty question. If the question is answered correctly, the computer continues with a more difficult question. In contrast, the revised version would have been a linear exam, giving all test takers the same set of questions regardless of responses to previous questions.

The revised GRE also called for a change in the test's timetable, almost doubling the test's length, to four hours.

Other changes would have included a modernized scoring scale as well as a standardizing 35 test dates, a departure from the year round dates it has now. However, GRE officials said this change is not a delay, but a complete departure from its revised GRE.

According to test experts, the proposed changes would have increased not only the security of the test, but also introduced new content to make the test better. Now that changes have been cancelled, concerns over security still exist.

"By cancelling the change, they still have to deal with the security concern," said Ben Baron, vice president for graduate program for Kaplan Test Prep and Admissions. "They have not made any changes, and we hope they do still do that."

Baron said Kaplan had been compiling a new test preparation course for the GRE.

Now that the changes have been cancelled, he said Kaplan will refocus its efforts on its current GRE test preparation method.

"While the announcement is disruptive, our ability to make rapid adjustments is what we do," Baron said. "We will continue to make course improvements, which is something we are constantly doing."

Despite the immediate setback put on the company, Baron said what matters most is the impact on students, many of whom already had begun preparing for the new exam.

"For them, the good news is that they will be able to take the shorter, more familiar exam," Baron said.

Some testing advocates argue that ETS's departure from its proposed changes shows the purpose for the new test was skewed.

"They pushed these flawed products to increase test-maker income, not improve assessment quality or meet student needs," said Robert Schaeffer, public education director of the group FairTest, an advocacy group which has been critical of the testing industry.

"ETS has repeatedly tried to rush computerized exams into the marketplace before they were ready for prime time."

City distributes trees for free, on request

By Kendra Stiles KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation Forestry Division is giving away trees to good homes

It's time for the yearly City Tree Planting Program, and the department is accepting requests for the trees, which will be provided at no cost to businesses and residences alike

J. David Mattox, Forestry Division supervisor, said the goal of the program is to maintain Manhattan's reputation as a "Tree City USA," which it has been awarded by the National Arbor Day Foundation for the past 29 vears

"The goal is two-fold," Mattox said. "We want to replace any trees that have been removed because they are defective or have died. We also want to put as many trees as possible in new housing divisions."

Funding for the project is coming straight from the parks and recreation budget, he said. Quantities are limited, so those wishing to receive a tree should apply as soon as possible.

"The amount of trees we provide is directly tied to the budget." Mattox said. "On average, I'd say we plant about 150 trees a year."

Trees will be planted inside the street's right-of-way, which is the area within 15 feet of the street on each side. Mattox said the Forestry Division will make personal inspections to each location in order to decide which kind of tree should be planted.

"There are a number of factors we'll look at when considering what type of tree to plant," Mattox said. "We'll look at the spacing from other trees, species of other trees, utilities both underground and overhead, mailboxes and driveways."

The Forestry Division will be working on the project from the end of April through May. Anyone wishing to request a tree can fill out a form on the city's Web site at www.ci.manhattan. ks.us or in the Forestry Division office.

"The best Easter I ever had was my freshman year of college," Lutz said. "That year, Easter fell on my birthday, and my entire family was there with me. I really enjoyed it." Lutz also said she participated in Easter egg hunts and dyeing eggs when she was young.

"Easter egg hunts used to be my favorite part," Lutz said. "My mom grew up on a farm, and we sometimes would go out there with my family. My grandparents would put coins in some of the eggs and candy in the others. I always tried to find the eggs with the money in

In recent years, Lutz said she has not been able to participate in the hunting of the eggs, because her family imposed age restrictions. However, Lutz said she receives the same level of joy hiding the eggs and watching the younger members of her family find them as she did when she was a hunter. Bradley Matlack, senior in mechanical engineering, also said he has fond Easter memories of spending time with family. Matlack said his family usually has a meal in the afternoon but not an Easter egg hunt every year.

"We occasionally did (Easter-egg hunts) when we were younger." Matlack said. "But we don't any more now that we

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wayne Goins, associate professor of jazz, is not hesitant to boast about the excellence of K-State's jazz program and its performers, and he says jazz music is flourishing in Manhat-

After a performance Wednesday night, Goins said he hopes he and other performers have created a TV special that will relay his jazz message to the rest of the Manhattan community.

Goins, K-State jazz performers and the Educational Communication Center combined forces Wednesday to create the "KSU Jazz All Stars," a live jazz performance filmed in Studio A of Bob Dole Hall.

The performance featured eight jazz combos consisting of K-State faculty and students and two guest musicians. The performance took place in front a live studio audience of about 30 invited guests.

The filming of the four-hour performance will be edited down to an hour for a TV special that will air on KSTB, cable channel 8, at 5 p.m. Sunday, April 29, for the "Show K-State" series.

"We really want this program to show the community the quality of our jazz program here at K-State and the great performers we have," Goins said. "Jazz is thriving in Manhattan, and we want the community to know that."

Jim Mock, manager of video production services with the Educational Communications Center, said the airing of the TV special also will receive assistance from KSBD-FM 91.9. The radio station will simulcast the audio from Wednesday's performance during the broadcast later in April.

"Right now our broadcasts on channel 8 are in mono, and we really wanted this one to be in stereo." Mock said. "We were very fortunate we could coordinate this and that the radio station allowed us this opportunity."

"KSU Jazz All Stars" was the brainchild of Goins and Mock, who had worked together on a few shorter jazz-performance features for "Show K-State."

"After doing a few shows, I brought the idea of filming a longer feature with a live audience to Professor Goins, and he was very enthusiastic about the idea," Mock

"This has been one of the bigger undertakings that we've done in the studio." Mock said.

The jazz students said they appreciated ECC's efforts.

"It's good to know that there are people listening and that enough people on campus care enough about the jazz program to make something like this happen," said Matt Hill, performer and senior in music. "A lot of work went into this, and I'm very grateful."

Premiere Magazine to leave void after being shut down

The magazine industry is forever changing. Go to Hasting's and see how many magazine genres are available and prepare to be overwhelmed. Personally, I go right for the film magazines. It always has been my dream to work at Entertainment Weekly, Movieline or Premiere Magazine. Now one of those dreams cannot happen.

According to a March 5 Variety article, Hachette LAUX Filipacchi Media U.S. will shut down the U.S. print edition of Premiere. The April issue will be its last. The movie magazine launched in 1987 and has covered the industry elite for the past 20 years.

The magazine still will appear online, but to me, it's not the same. No longer will I be able to glide across the glossy pages of celebrity photos, movie stills and in-depth features like I once was.

The charisma of a magazine just does not transfer to a Web site. E-zines are not a bad thing - they are a great way to access information and offer a quick dose of the magazine. However, the fact that Filipacchi thinks keeping the online site is an acceptable replacement for the magazine is a mistake. With speculation that print organizations are a dying medium, this just adds fuel the fire. For four years, I have discussed with classmates and faculty about whether the print versions will be obsolete in coming years. Will they steadily decrease in coming years? Maybe. Are print and Web versions the same? No. It is a great loss to the film magazine genre and an even greater personal loss as one of my favorite magazines. Hopefully people still will visit the Web site, so I can get a monthly dose of Premiere. Even though circulation might have been down, at least the publication was a genuine film magazine, instead of the celebrity tabloids that readily are associated with the genre.

Maybe with the absence of this great publication, another will arise and fill its void.

At the final meeting of the 2006-07 Student Senate term, senators voted against an amendment requiring student body presidential and vicepresidential candidates to obtain signatures to support their candidacy.

The amendment would have required presidential and vice presidential candidates to gather either two percent of the number of votes cast in the previous year's primary election or 70 signatures, whichever number was greater. The amendment failed with a vote of 20-29-1 after a 45-minute debate among senators.

Nick Levendofsky, 2007 elections commissioner, spoke in support of the amendment during the March 29 Senate meeting.

"We felt it was necessary because with the positions of president and vice president, it's a position to be taken seriously," said Levendofsky, senior in agricultural communications and journalism.

Emily Schmeidler, Senate Operations Committee chair, said Levendofsky approached committee members after the March elections about the amendment.

"(Senate Operations Committee members) were approached by the elections commissioner about this particular change because we felt that it would help to eliminate some of the people that are running just to

Basketball fans respond with disbelief to Huggins' sudden departure

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Huggieville" was born the day Bob Huggins became K-State's men's basketball coach.

K-State President Jon Wefald said Huggins brought an aura back to K-State basketball that had been missing for a long time.

Almost one year later, after the announcement that Huggins will leave Manhattan to coach at his alma mater, West Virginia, the magic is gone, and "Huggieville" became an unspeakable term.

Some fans, bitter about Huggins' departure, made their protests public.

Trey Thompson, junior in elementary education, and Jon Erskine, junior in business, stood outside Bramlage Coliseum during Thursday's press conference, donning garbage bags over their heads along with anti-Huggins phrases like "Coachlessville," and "What about Walker?"

"He said come, and we ran," Thompson said. "He said scream, and we packed it out. We did everything for him, and he just split."

Thompson said he thought Huggins should have announced his departure himself.

"You feel like you got hit in the stomach," Thompson said. "I feel like I got cheated on — and I wanted to believe it, all the signs point to it — and now it's coming out, and there's nothing I can do. It's a pretty sobering feeling."

Steve Ballard of Ballard's Sporting Goods, who said he coined the term "Huggieville," altered the nickname after Huggins' resignation. Minutes after the press conference, Ballard's pressed its first set of the altered

IHOP, Taco Bell — but not Olive Garden included as part of redevelopment

By Elise Podhajsky KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rumors have been circulating through Manhattan about which restaurants will be introduced as part of the city's redevelopment program.

Olive Garden and the International House of Pancakes are two names mentioned around campus and the city. Only one has been confirmed, though.

Dial Realty will break ground for a brand-new, 6,000square-foot IHOP sometime in May, said Rick Kiolbasa, partner at Dial Realty. The restaurant is scheduled to open in August and will be at the corner of McCall Avenue and Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Kiolbasa said the new IHOP franchise will have the same look as its other buildings across the country - complete with a blue La Fiesta, a Mexican restaurant at 2301 Tuttle Creek Blvd., opened Jan. 6, 2007.

Teara Pendleton, guest services representative for IHOP headquarters, said the franchise will be independently owned and will conduct its own hirings. The franchise owner could not be reached about staffing information or expectations for the new restaurant.

Dial Realty, which is involved in several projects throughout the Midwest, has been working with the Manhattan downtown redevelopment project for about four years. The company's most recent endeavors include plans for the new IHOP, as well as Wendy's, Pizza Hut and Taco Bell restaurants.

President and chief executive officer of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, Lyle Butler, said Wendy's is under construction and that Taco Bell and Pizza Hut will follow shortly.

Wendy's is scheduled for completion sometime in June, and Taco Bell will be built where Long John Silver's had been at the corner of Bluemont Avenue and Third Street, Kiolbasa said. A new Pizza Hut also will be nearby.

Part of the redevelopment plan is to have two or three more restaurants on the north side of town, but Butler said Dial has not officially released any names.

"Any other names that you have at this point will all be rumor and speculation," he said.

Unfinished business

Yesterday was a sad day in the history of K-State.

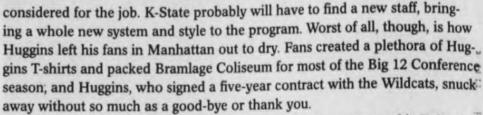

After spending only a year in Manhattan, basketball coach Bob Huggins jetted off to coach at his alma mater, West Virginia University.

Huggins, who led the team to its best finish in several years and revived a spirit in the once-great K-State basketball program, left numerous fans speechless. Now, the program is left with more questions than one could imagine.

Where are all the recruits going to go? Huggins brought in arguably the top recruiting class in the country. Now that he's gone, those recruits, who come from all over the country, might not want to stay in a Huggie-less Manhat-

Who is the next coach going to be? K-State will have to hire its second new coach in as many years.

Just about everyone and their mother who is affiliated with the K-State men's basketball program is being

Most students at K-State had never seen a respectable K-State basketball team before this year. With the No. 1 recruiting class and a good coach, fans were looking forward to K-State not only making its first NCAA Tournament appearance since 1997, but also advancing far into the tournament.

President Jon Wefald classified the situation best at yesterday's press conference: it's not fair. It's not fair to leave a college after bringing back decades of tradition and building the hopes of nearly every K-State fan.

Interviewing process proves to be as troublesome as dating

This was my third visit to a liquor store in the past week. Why was I so desperate to welcome alcohol-induced amnesia? It was not a bad date. No, it was a bad interview. An interview that left such a sour taste in my mouth I was ready to throw in the towel and call it a day. It was during this third journey back to my hotel, beer clutched in a death grasp, that I had an epiphany: I have felt this way before.

LEAH

SAND

The I-don't-want-to-think-I-justwant-to-drink feeling that pervades after certain types of dates with certain types of men. Then came the realization: the interview process is almost identical to the dating game, and if that was true, I was dating all the mamas' boys with commitment phobias.

My first interview in San Francisco was a lot like my first date in high school. I was not given a specific time or day until the night before - the firm must have wanted me to think they were aloof and highly attractive to other applicants.

I was running late, teetering in platform heels, making sure my panties weren't showing through my skirt, worrying about how I would look to the person I was meeting. Stumbling out of the hotel, cursing my choice of footwear, I stuck a finger up and a leg out to hail a cab. A yellow cab with its light on pulls up in two seconds. Thank God I'm a chick. Getting a cab is almost easier than getting a guy's attention at a bar.

After a rocky ride to the bottom of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge, I walked into an unassuming door. It looked like the entrance to an apartment building that went co-op in the '80s. I stumbled inside feeling awkward and wishing that I had broken my heels in sooner. I felt like a 13-year-old girl walking in stilettos for the first time.

The receptionist greeted me with a wry smile.

"And your name, miss?" She said "miss" with the kind of disdain an ex-girlfriend would use to address her old boyfriend's prospects. I was directed to a chair and sat there, nervous, and with my knees together to show people I was a respectable lady who was worthy of the job.

My interviewer rounded the corner and said, "Leah," as though my test results were ready and she was going to tell me that no, I didn't test positive for mono. I stood up in a hurry (I like people to know I have cat-like reflexes), knocking my large purse from my lap, its contents sent sprawling on the ground.

A jubilee of tampons came flying out. So there I was, first interview in a big city and I was on my knees in a white skirt on the lobby floor collecting Tampax.

The situation could not have been more entertaining to the bystanders. Now for me, on the other hand, the situation was horrendous. So much for coming across as a classy lady. Classy ladies are never on their knees in a work environment, much less on their knees in a skirt - hence my dire need for beer at the end of the interview. I wish I could say this wonderful experience was an isolated one, that nothing else embarrassing happened to me during another interview or in San Francisco at all. The reality is that interviewing, like dating, is a terribly humbling and grounding experience.

There I was, wandering in the dark around the Tenderloin District (the East St. Louis of San Francisco), desperate to find a liquor store. I finally found one and walked in, anxious to get a six-pack of Pacifico and erase the last few hours. As I entered the store with a million neon lights, I passed a man with a loaded shotgun sitting on a stool next to the entrance.

At least the store owners were smarter than I was - I only had a tiny vial of pepper spray to defend myself from a potential robbery/ beer snatching. And I would fight to keep the beer, if necessary. I had more interviews to come and more things to forget.

Problem of gas prices set to puzzle lawmakers for decades

While everyone was wondering about the moron with his hair done up like a peacock on American Idol, the Government Accountability Office, Congress' watchdog, released its much-anticipated report on peaks and declines in global oil production.

JONAS HOGG

The government twirlers' best guess of when oil productions would begin to decline was "sometime between now and 2040." Following was the standard Kabuki about how we're going to dump corn into our SUVs and keep up our little motoring disco, ad infinitum. The good news was that by 2015, with big, fat investments in infrastructure (paid for with money sponged out of the cosmos), we'll have displaced a whopping 4 percent of our petroleum usage.

Snailing along the ethanol dream would work well if most figures for significant declines in oil production didn't read closer to 2010 than 2040, meaning we're going to be financing our ethanol production during already skyrocketing fuel

Recently, the head of Mexico's oil monopoly, Pemex, told the Associated Press that between now and 2015, Mexico's largest oil field is going to crap out to the tune of 14 percent each year. Mexico, for those keeping track, is our No. 2 source of petroleum imports. When Mexico tanks, prices go up and food gets scarce, we're going to see what an immigration crisis really looks like

Barring Mexico, our other sources will be limited to the rabidly unstable nations of western Africa; countries that hate our guts, like Venezuela and Saudi Arabia; and oil fields where production already has declined 90 percent (the North Sea)

The last great white hope of Hummer drivers everywhere is Canada, which is set to rake in fat cash by exploring the oil sands way up yon in Northern Alberta. Being that Canada is the only certain stable and secure source of oil for the next 10 years, I expect we'll be finding that international cooperation backscratcher the current White House commode filler threw out as firewood.

Contingent on the dollar remaining stable and the Middle East not going to pot, this summer's gas prices already are expected to be 25 cents higher than last year. Throw in any number of things that could go wrong, and seeing "4" in front of the decimal might be our next big

If that happens, our great suburbanization projects might just crap out for good. Driving an hour each way to work was tenable when gas was a buck a gallon.

Now that prices have near quadrupled in less than four years and the average family's debt has risen to match, the bulk of Americans might find going to work to be a negative-profit enterprise.

But this, along with the idea that one day the mighty 18-wheelers ripping the hell out of America's highways might not deliver the Glutton Man frozen dinners and various Chinese hamster toys to the Wal-Mart masses, lives somewhere in the realm of science-fiction.

Bottom line: no one, not Washington or Topeka or city hall has any inkling of moving to fix this, meaning more Best Buys, Wal-Marts and shabby suburbanized homes, built and zoned specifically so driving is the only option for shopping, working or anything else. Take a nice walk down Manhattan's newest residences sometime; you might notice a lack of sidewalks.

The GAO report might have been a slight nod in the direction we need to go, but no one moved on revitalizing our communities' abilities to be self-sufficient. Says me, in 60 years, we'll be explaining to our grandkids why we paved over the most fertile land on the planet to build another crappy Overland Park subdivision.

8 U.S. SOLDIERS KILLED DUE TO MILITANT FIGHTING IN BAGHDAD AREA

BAGHDAD, Iraq – The U.S. military reported Thursday that eight U.S. soldiers were killed in the Baghdad area over the past three days as militants fought back against a security plan in its eighth week. An Army helicopter went down south of the capital, wounding four, after an Iraqi official said insurgents fired at the aircraft.

The U.S. military said the downing of the helicopter, which was carrying nine people, was under investigation.

An Iraqi army official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of security concerns, said the helicopter went down after it came under fire from anti-aircraft guns near the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Latifiyah, 20 miles south of Baghdad.

BRITISH CITIZENS UPSET BY SAILORS' CONFESSIONS DURING CAPTIVITY IN IRAN

ROYAL MARINE BASE CHIVENOR, England – Fifteen Royal Navy crew members freed from Iran enjoyed their first night on English soil Thursday. Amid the relief and tearful embraces, some British citizens raised questions about the sailors' conduct and apparent confessions in captivity.

Though much of the country rallied behind the crew's return, others criticized crew members for offering apologies when none were required and for appearing in videos in which they admitted to and offered regrets for entering Iranian waters.

Defense officials sought to quash the criticism and said none of the sailors and marines will be punished for making the apologies.

GREEK CRUISE SHIP STRIKES REEF; 1600 PASSENGERS, TOURISTS EVACUATED

SANTORINI, Greece – Scores of passengers climbed down rope ladders to rescue vessels after a Greek cruise ship struck a reef Thursday and started listing in the Mediterranean. The collision forced the evacuation of 1,600 people, including North Carolina high-school students.

Authorities said hundreds of American tourists, at least two school groups from Canada and more than 100 Spanish travelers were on the Sea Diamond when it hit the rocks off the island of Santorini shortly before 4 p.m.

"A lot of us were taking pictures from when we were coming into Santorini. All of a sudden, there was this big jolt," said Catherine Small, 17, one of more than two dozen students from North Carolina on board.

POPE WASHES THE FEET OF 12 MEN IN HOLY WEEK RITUAL IN ROME BASILICA

ROME – Pope Benedict XVI bathed the feet of 12 laymen in a Rome basilica as part of a Holy Thursday tradition symbolizing humility. At the same time, he kept up an intense schedule of public ceremonies that will culminate on Easter.

The pope poured water from a golden pitcher onto the feet of the men, who wore white robes and were seated in a row. Benedict then used a white cloth to dry the feet of the men, who were drawn from the laity of the Diocese of Rome. As pontiff, Benedict is also bishop of Rome.

Benedict, who turns 80 on April 16, made several holy week appearances.

MAN ACCUSED OF HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES BECOMES PRESIDENT OF CHECHNYA

GUDERMES, Russia – A widely feared former security chief who has been linked to human rights abuses was sworn in as Chechnya's new president Thursday, vowing to bring prosperity to the region wracked by two wars, growing Islamic extremism and grinding poverty since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

The Kremlin is pinning its hopes for a lasting peace in the North Caucasus region on the gruff-talking, rough-mannered Ramzan Kadyrov, whose father, Akhmad, also held Moscow's backing until he was assassinated in a bombing in May 2004.

The 30-year-old Kadyrov, whose predecessor warned of a growing personality cult after being forced out in February, is credited with a reconstruction boom during his term as prime minister.

PEOPLE, ANIMALS IN CHINA POTENTIALLY EXPOSED TO TAINTED WHEAT GLUTEN

BEIJING – A Chinese company accused of selling chemical-tainted wheat gluten linked to the pet food deaths of cats and dogs in the U.S. said Thursday that most of its sales are domestic, raising the possibility that people or animals in China might have been exposed to the chemical.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration last week blocked wheat gluten imports from the Xuzhou Anying Biologic Technology Development Co. in the eastern Chinese city of Xuzhou, saying the imports contained melamine, a chemical found in plastics and pesticides.

Tax services available for students

By Willow Williamson KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The deadline to turn in taxes quickly is approaching, but students have several opportunities for tax help in Manhattan and online before the April 17 deadline.

K-State Research and Extension offers free tax-preparation services at the UFM Community Learning Center.

Students can bring their W2 forms and photo IDs, and a certified volunteer will file their state and federal taxes.

Jennifer Wilson, county extension director, said though volunteers at the center can file most taxes, they cannot fill out tax forms for anyone who has had a job in another state.

"Our tax software is only good for the state of Kansas," Wilson said. "So we can't help students do another state's return." She said certain tax forms are more complicated, and the learning center does not have the staff qualified to fill them out.

"We also cannot help international students," she said.

"We don't have any volunteers that are qualified to do that type of return."

The service is only available to people with an annual income of less than $40,000 a year, and the center cannot help members of the military.

Tax preparation will be available on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays from 3 to 7 p.m. until April 12.

Though the learning center offers one of the only services available to students for free, multiple businesses offer tax help for a fee, like H&R Block.

H&R Block, 622 Tuttle Creek Blvd., has a special discount for students.

"Students can bring in their information, and if it's a 10-40EZ, they get it for $49 and they get a $10 Starbucks coffee card," said Patricia Peterson, office manager.

The $49 covers the basic tax form. Peterson said H&R Block can file anyone's taxes; however, if students own their own businesses or have income from another state, it could cost more to get everything filed.

Peterson said there are benefits to using H&R Block's services as opposed to Internet sites or private tax preparation businesses. H&R Block employees are qualified and required to keep up with their training, she said.

"We have experienced tax professionals," she said. "They all have to take continuing education."

Also, should anything go wrong, Peterson said H&R Block employees help customers handle their tax issues.

"We guarantee that they are prepared correctly, or we will pay any penalties or fees that are assessed should we make an error," Peterson said.

H&R Block offers several online services at www. hrblock.com. One service allows people to file their taxes by themselves, and another allows people to file online with the assistance of an H&R Block representative.

Danielle Campa, senior in marketing, said she uses www. TaxACT.com to file her taxes. She said Web sites are generally fast and often let people directly deposit their tax refunds into their bank accounts.

"It was easy, and they directly deposited my money into my account," Campa said.

For students wanting to file their taxes online with or without help, www.irs.org offers a link that supplies multiple Web sites, including TaxACT.com.

With a little Web surfing or browsing through the yellow pages, Campa said one can find help to translate tax forms and get the most out of tax refunds.

Votes from Pottawatomie County alter BOE results; Herrman replaces Hummel in final seat

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the dust cleared following Tuesday's voting, it appeared the final seat on the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board would go to Karen Hummel. However, with the 383 votes from Pottawatomie County, Curt Herrman emerged as the winner by 14 votes.

Jolene Campbell, deputy county clerk for the Riley County Courthouse, said because some of the voters in Pottawatomie County send their children to school in the Manhattan-Ogden school district, they are eligible to vote for the school board members.

"Once we got their results, it added to the previous results and made up the final total," she said. "Because they don't have direct voting machines, they voted paper this year and took care of their own voters and did all of the counting of their votes."

Herrman said waiting for election night results had its ups and downs.

"It was an emotional rollercoaster the whole night because it was bouncing back and forth," he said. "They came out with the final tally, and it showed that I had lost by three. When I got home, someone called from the election committee and told me I had won."

Although it appears Hummel will not take a seat on the board, she said she is content with the results.

"Both of us are in support of public education regardless of the outcome," she said. "Curt will make a very good member, and at this point, I expect that he will be seated on the board."

Hummel said she does not plan to run again, but she will continue to be involved.

Herrman almost certainly will take the final seat, but there is still a small chance the results could change, Campbell said.

"We have 71 provisional ballots in Riley County that could change the results," she said.

The provisional ballots will be counted on Monday.

Herrman said the prospects of improving the school district's technology and increasing pay for both teachers and staff are what are driving him to participate.

"I want to get in there and go to work for the kids," he said.

Huggins leaves K-State after one season

By Jeffrey Rake KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bob Huggins is done as men's basketball coach at K-State after just one year on the job.

The coach announced his resignation Thursday afternoon amid speculation that he would accept an offer from West Virginia, his alma mater. He is expected to be formally introduced today as the Mountaineers' next coach, replacing John Beilein, who left Tuesday to fill a coaching vacancy at Michigan.

Despite exhausting keep Huggins at K-State, President Jon Wefald and Athletics Director Tim Weiser said ultimately, the decision was Huggins' to make.

They just were not pleased with "Our concern and our issue in talking to Bob was that everything has a time and a place, and this wasn't the right time," Weiser said. "It may have been the right place, but a year into this was by no means a time to say we finished the job."

Huggins boarded a private plane at about 3:20 p.m. on Thursday at the Manhattan Regional Airport and traveled to West Virginia. He would not confirm whether or not he had officially accepted the Mountaineers' coaching vacancy.

Asked if the rumors were true, Huggins said, "I don't know if it is or

During a 4:30 p.m. news conference, however, Wefald and Weiser were all but certain it was. Wefald said he was optimistic about the future of K-State basketball, and Weiser

Bob Huggins' timeline at K-State

March 23, 2006 | K-State hires Huggins Many K-State fans awoke that morning to discover Bob Huggins would last March over the men's basketball team. Until then, the idea of Huggins coaching the Wildcats was only a dream.

Huggins showed what seven months of recruiting without NCAA guidelines could produce, signing

Michael Beasley, Fred Brown, Jacob Pullen and

Dominique Sutton. Rivals.com rated the class, which included Bill Walker, No. 1 in the country.

Jan. 17 | Huggins calls out fans After another disappointing turnout from fans,

Huggins ripped the fans during his postgame radio show. He even went so far to say Bramlage should be called "Bennettville" if the fans were not going to do things the right way.

Feb. 19 Black Monday In an ode to Huggins and his favorite color, nearly every fan in Bramlage came to K-State's game against Kansas decked in black. Unfortunately, the Wildcats could not give the fans what they really wanted: the first win over the Jayhawks in Bramlage

> March 11 | NCAA committee snubs Cats After nearly a decade of not watching Selection Sunday, Wildcat fans finally tuned in to see if their team would make the "Big Dance." However, the committee did not believe K-State's résumé was worthy.

That move set the wheels in motion for Huggins to return to his alma mater. Soon after, Huggins' name appeared at the top of the Mountaineers' wish list.

April 5 | Huggins' resignation official After several days of silence, Athletics Director Tim Weiser announced Huggins' decision to leave, despite the university's best efforts to keep him in Manhattan. Huggins met with his players one final time before leaving from Manhattan Regional Airport.

His face was haggard, showing every minute of a surely sleepless night. A hint of stubble lined his chin. His piercing blue eyes seemed hollow.

Later, Athletics Director Tim Weiser would call Huggins a "tortured soul." As he made his way to the airport terminal, that's exactly how Huggins looked.

He didn't have much to say. It would have taken hours - days, perhaps - to explain everything that was running through his mind. And the plane was waiting, a little white turbo-prop that would take him home.

There was a time when all Huggins wanted was to get away from West Virginia and its dirty, stinking coal mines - those black holes that swallowed up so many lives. Now, he just wanted to go back.

After all, this is what his dad always wanted. Charlie Huggins was a hell of a ball coach in his day, you know. He taught Bobby how to shoot a jump shot, how to throw a pass, how to make the boys play their guts out. When Charlie came to Manhattan a month ago, he said he hoped Bobby could come back and coach West Virginia someday. Now, he will get his wish.

As the airport's automatic door slid open, Huggins paused a moment, standing on the threshold, one foot in and one foot out. Something flickered across his face

The events that led to this moment would become clearer in the coming hours. There would be a press conference, with clicking cameras and flashing lights and scribbling pens.

A press release would come out, harsh black type set against white paper. "Bob Huggins has resigned as head men's basketball coach at Kansas State to become head coach at West Virginia," it read.

Weiser would address a room full of reporters, struggling to explain a situation even he couldn't completely comprehend.

"I felt he was really conflicted,"

RUN | Track team travels to historic track this weekend

This weekend, the K-State track and field team will compete on a historic track as it travels to Eugene, Ore., to take part in the Pepsi

Hayward Field has been used in three Olympic track and field trials, nine NCAA Championships and six USA Championships, the most for any track in each category.

"There certainly is a tremendous amount of history there," said coach Cliff Rovelto. "Most people tend to think of distance runners, but if you look at their school records, there are huge names in almost every event." Steve Prefontaine, a former distance runner from Oregon, has been immortalized in movies like "Prefontaine" and "Without Limits." He died in 1975 in a car accident, but before that, he held every American record in distance running from the two-mile run to the 10k. Not only are the track and its runners famous, but the fans are as well.

"From a historical perspective, there's been times when track overshadowed other sports — certainly the major sports," Rovelto said. "The community there really embraces (track) and supports it. One of the first meets I went to when I was a grad assistant at the University of Kansas was a dual meet with Oregon, and there was 15,000 people in the stands for a dual K-State also will send athletes to the Emporia State Relays this weekend in Emporia, Kan.

"It is going to be some of the younger kids," Rovelto said. "We are not going to leave some of our best athletes at home. These kids have an opportunity to do something there."

BBC | K-State to square off against Missouri this weekend

The K-State baseball team (21-8, 3-3 Big 12 Conference) will brave the elements and kick off its three-game set with Missouri (22-8, 4-2) at 3 p.m. today at Tointon Family Stadium.

The teams enter the game with similar seasons thus far, and both are about to break into the USA Today/ESPN Coaches' Poll top 25.

"I look at Missouri, and I see them as being one of the most underrated teams around the last few years. Year in and year out, they're winning 40 games," said coach Brad Hill. "They don't get the respect that they deserve."

Missouri's success has come in much the same way as K-State's this season.

Both rely on base hits rather than home runs and have strong bullpens and an ace on the mound. Those aces will square off against one another this afternoon.

For the Wildcats, that means junior Brad Hutt, who is 5-1 this year with an ERA of 2.68. He also has 27 strikeouts compared to just 13 walks in 47 innings pitched.

The Tigers' gunslinger is sophomore Aaron Crow, who is 4-0 this season with an ERA of 2.56. He also is averaging close to one strikeout

"It becomes a bit of a guessing game with guys like that," Hill said. "The important thing is that you want to see a lot of pitches, (but) at the same time you want to try and get some fastballs now and then and turn your guys loose on a first pitch fastball if it's there."

If Crow isn't enough to worry about, the Wildcat coaches and players also will have to do their best not to be distracted by the recent goings on in the university's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

"We've really got to block out a lot of the things going on around here with our athletic department," Hill said. "We've got to stay focused with what we're doing and stay positive."

TEN | Wildcats hope to win 2nd Big 12 match in a row

K-State might have found its confidence Wednesday when the Wildcats beat lowa State 5-2. The team is hoping to keep the streak alive when Texas Tech comes to town Saturday for a dual Big 12 Conference match-up.

K-State (3-11, 1-4 Big 12) will play at home this weekend for the first time since March 10. The Wildcats will face Texas Tech (9-7, 2-4 Big 12), which was ranked No. 69 on March 27 but since has fallen out of the Intercollegiate Tennis Association rankings.

Last year, when K-State traveled to Lubbock, Texas, to take on Texas Tech, they eventually lost in a 3-4 decision.

Before Wednesday, K-State had 10 straight losses and only two wins on the season (over Drake on Jan. 27, 7-0, and over Utah on Feb. 16, 5-2). K-State was ranked No. 63 on Feb. 27 but since has fallen out of the rankings.

ROW | Wildcats head to Lawrence for Kansas Cup

The K-State women's rowing team will compete against rival Kansas in the Kansas Cup on Saturday, looking to bring home the trophy for the third consecutive year.

The Wildcats won the inaugural Kansas Cup in 1998 and lost the next six head-to-head meetings, bringing the Wildcats' record in the

"There is a great rivalry between the two schools, so it boosts it up a notch," said coach Patrick Sweeney. "It wouldn't matter if we had won 10 races in a row, the athletes would still do their best."

Destination weddings gain popularity

By Wendy Haun KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

'It's been almost 20 years since the Beach Boys released "Kokomo," a song that lists several romantic Caribbeanisland getaways.

Now, many brides- and grooms-to-be have been leaning toward the trend of destination weddings, saying "I do" in a foreign country or at the beach.

Lynette Lee, a wedding planner with Bliss Weddings of Kansas City, Kan., said her team pairs with a travel agency to plan destination weddings. The most popular destinations patrons visit through her company are Maui, Mexico and the Caribbean. Costs range from $750 to $5,000 per person, depending on the location.

Bliss Weddings purchases travel tickets through www. aatravelingonline.com, a local travel agency owned by Richard Greenlee and affiliated with national travel network YTB. The process of purchasing tickets involves several people, so less problems arise, Lee said.

Though the cost might seem steep, Lee said destination weddings can save money for the bride and groom.

"It's a one-stop venue," she said. "You can have your beautiful, sunny environment. It's usually an outdoor ceremony with the good weather, and then the newlyweds can just stay there for the honey-moon."

Some concerns arise with a destination wedding that the bridal party should consider before deciding, Lee said.

"They should ask if the destination has the site that they are looking for, first and foremost," she said. "If you're having someone plan it for you, you should also ask how much of the planning will be done and what will be left up to you."

With numerous details involved and the cost per person, sometimes not everyone can be included in the wedding plans, Lee said.

"Not all of your friends and family may be able to be there with you," she said.

Information about destination weddings can be found at a popular wedding Web site, www.theknot.com. The Knot has links to the requirements of obtaining marriage licenses in foreign countries as well as information about the countries of interest.

According to The Knot, a destination wedding can be favorable for the wedding party's plans if the bride and groom wish to keep it private.

The first step is choosing a location based on the bridal party's preferences and budget. A destination wedding is not something to throw together overnight, according to the site. Working with a wedding planner who is familiar with destination weddings is also a way to make the day less stressful.

How to dance the waltz

By Lacey D. Mackey KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Shall we dance?"

It's the fairy-tale question posed at the finale of every "happily ever after." But the real question is, "Can you dance?"

To end wedding festivities, many couples choose to continue the party with a dance. Though many types of dancing are acceptable, traditional dances like the foxtrot, jive and swing revive for the big "I do."

To get you in the dancing mood, here are a few guidelines to help you learn one popular dance step: the waltz.

1. Get into position by facing your partner. If you are the leader, place your right hand on your partner's waist slightly around the back and extend your left hand to your side with your elbow bent and your palm raised.

With that hand, grasp your partner's right hand in a loose grip, and make sure your partner's left hand is on your right shoulder, with his or her elbow bent. Your partner should mirror your movements.

2. On the first beat, step forward with your left foot. Your partner should follow your lead by doing the opposite of what you do on each beat - in this case, stepping back with his or her right foot.

3. On the second beat, step forward and to the right with your right foot. Trace an upside-down letter L in the air with your foot as you do this.

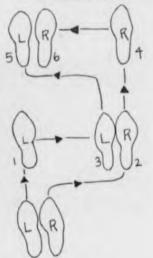

4. Shift your weight to your right foot. Keep your left foot stationary.

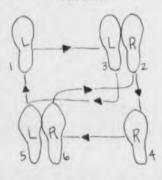

5. On the third beat, slide your left foot over to your right and stand with your feet together.

6. On the fourth beat, step back with your right foot.

7. On the fifth beat, step back and to the left with your left foot, this time tracing a backward L. Shift your weight to your left foot.

Progressive waltz

8. On the final beat, slide your right foot toward your left until your feet are together; now you're ready to start over with your left foot.

9. Repeat steps 2-8 turning you and your partner's orientation slowly to the left by slightly varying the placement of your

A girl's dream, a boy's nightmare

The mere fact that I am writing this column suggests that I am opinionated.

DAYNE LOGAN

Normally an opinion is a good thing. It shows that you care enough about something and have given enough thought to it to make up your mind one way or the other. When it comes to wedding planning, however, guys need to learn to put opinions aside and leave major decisions up to the ladies.

Now I understand that a wedding is a two-party matter, but let me explain one thing: girls start planning their weddings before they can walk. In fact, I'm convinced most start planning while in the womb. Maybe it's part of their developmental process. They're conceived; they sprout some arms, a leg or two and a head; and then, all of a sudden, the brain just starts going crazy. The little fetus begins dreaming of chocolate fountains, bridesmaid dresses and the perfect bouquet.

Can some guy who shamelessly wears tube socks with dress shoes and still thinks farts are hilarious possibly offer any sort of constructive opinion about how to plan a wedding to someone who has been dreaming about this day for the entirety of her existence? I think not. Let's be honest, gents - when's the last time you thought, "Man, I really think sea-foam green would make a nice accent

You don't want to make all the decisions that go along with planning a wedding. You have to decide where to have it, when to have it, whom to invite, what to wear, what to eat and where to get flowers. Who's going to take pictures? Who's going to bake the cake? Where's the reception going to be, and who's going to preside over the wedding? Do you hire a band, an orchestra, a disc jockey, a choir or all of the above? What about where to stay after the wedding? What about where guests will stay after the wedding?

In other words, there's a lot to decide. Any additional comments from their future husbands will only give the brides more to think about and add additional stress to an already overwhelming situation.

Here's the problem: she's still going to ask. It is inevitable that the bride-to-be is going to ask if you like her ideas for centerpieces or if you're all right with wearing a fuchsia tie (had to check the Crayola Web site for that spelling).

Even though the truth is

Illustration by Lacey D. Mackey | COLLEGIAN probably that fuchsia makes you want to throw up and the centerpieces take up too much room, she really doesn't want to know that. It's one of those traps girls spring - a mind game, if you will. Rather than your opinion, what she really wants is affirmation she's doing a good job.

So, whether you're already engaged, soon to be engaged or just got lost looking for the sports page, remember, weddings are a time for girls to dream and guys to stay out of the way.

Couples use tradition to honor loved ones

By Ben Hedges KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Weddings are a time of unhindered happiness, not just for husband and wife, but for family and friends who come to take part in the celebration. It is customary for couples to pay tribute to those in attendance, but many couples also take the opportunity to honor past loved ones.

According to a forum www.weddingchannel.com, many methods used to honor a deceased family member are subtle but ensure the person's memory is part of the ceremony. Some customs include setting aside an empty chair reserved for the family member, lighting a candle to burn through the ceremony or reading a poem the family member enjoyed. Nicole Skidmore, senior in elementary education, used symbolic items for her wed-"Our altar flowers were in memory of my grandma," Skidmore said, "and I also wore a garter that she wore at her wedding because it held special meaning to me."

Skidmore said she always planned on wearing the garter, even before her grandmother passed away, but a relative gave her the idea to use roses as altar flowers in memory of her grandmother "I had a cousin that did it for her wedding, and I just thought it was a cute idea," she said. Elizabeth Gilbertson, graduate student in physics, said she wanted to be subtle and discrete when honoring her relatives and opted for a brief prayer in their memories. "This option was actua presented to us by the clergy in the church where we were married," Gilbertson said, "and it seemed appropriate, but it most certainly wasn't anything unique."

Gilbertson said she did not want to lose focus on a time of celebration with something

"The other family members who were also affected by the loss found it to be appropriate and tasteful," she said.

Although it has become custom to honor the death of relatives at weddings, some couples make it a point to ensure the ceremony does not become a funeral Subtlety is key in honoring family, but couples always find it important to give thanks to those who are unable to watch their loved ones walk down the

Professor works to control greenhouse pests

By Willow Williamson KANSASSTATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Nechols, professor of entomology, is researching methods to control the twospotted mite, a pest that feeds on more than 400 different types of plants. In a natural environment, the mite is controlled by weather and other predators.

However, within a greenhouse setting, little or nothing can control the tiny and highly reproductive mites.

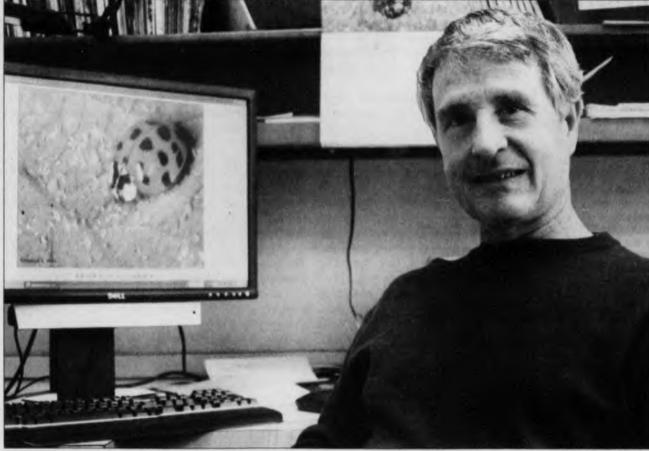

"In greenhouses, there really aren't any natural enemies that are very common that would come into a greenhouse and have any real impact to control the twospotted mites," Nethols said.

Nechols, in collaboration with David Margolies, professor of entomology, is researching a formof biological control to contain the mites, which have the ability to kill an entire crop and are found in almost every greenhouse.

The team is working to understand the efficiency and effectiveness of using a predator mite, Plytoseiulus persimilis which feeds exclusively on the two spotted mite.

The predator mites already are widely known and sometimes used to control the two-spotled mite. However, they are more costly than pesticides, so farmers rarely use them.

Also, because researchers do not know what plants the pests tend to pray on and in what numbers, it is impossible to know how many of the predator mites to buy. If farmers buy too few, the mites could be ineffective. Buying too many could waste a lot of money.

Nechols said he is trying to find a way to predict how many predator mites would be necessary to control the two-spotted mites. The team hopes to offer farmers recommendations based on whatever plants they have, a goal Nechols said is in sight.

"We feel confident that we could give some pretty good recommendations for a couple of plants that we've studied," he said.

The problem is that twospotted mites feed on many different types of plants, and most farmers have a variety of plants in their greenhouses.

"We would spend 10 careers trying to do a specific set of recommendations for every plant that people plant," he said.

Instead, the team is working to generalize the types of plants that attract the twospotted mite to obtain an accurate estimate.

"We are going to pick and choose a few that kind of represent the whole ballpark," he said. "If we just do a sampling of different ones we ought to be able to generalize, and say, 'If you have this type of plant, no matter what it is, here is your set of recommenda-

Nechols said the goal is to make biological control of the two-spotted mites more cost-effective and efficient for farmers than pesticides.

"One of our broader goals is to give people options away from pesticides, to reduce human health risks in greenhouses (and) other type of environmental contamination," he said.

Nechols said one of his other goals is to teach people to use pesticides more efficiently because farmers often use them too much and too often, which can allow pests to develop a resistance to

"If you use one thing too long, that organism adapts to it, and all of a sudden, that pesticide is no good any more," he said. "If you can use an alternative like biological control, you can solve environmental problems, you can make pesticides last longer, all those good things."

Nechols received his bachelor's degree in biology from Balwin-Wallace College in Cleveland.

He received master's and doctoral degrees in entomology from Cornell University in New York. He has been teaching at K-State since

Round and round: the carousel continues

Just as the coaching carousel was starting to slow down, Bob Huggins' decision to leave K-State with four years left on his contract ensured it would keep on spinning.

Huggins resigned Thursday after just one year as K-State's head coach. He is expected to formally accept the coaching position at West Virginia. Here's a look at some of the other high-profile NCAA coaches to leave this season:

Tubby Smith

After receiving a considerable amount of pressure from Kentucky fans — and presumably, from the athletic department — Smith resigned as the Wildcats' coach on March 22. Minnesota hired him later that day. Smith will take over a program that lost 20 games for the first time in school history last season.

A former NBA coach for the Denver Nuggets, Bzdelik spent the last two years at Air Force, where he guided the Falcons to the semifinal round of the National Invitation Tournament. However, he decided to leave for Colorado on Tuesday, taking over a Buffaloes squad that finished last in the Big 12 Conference last season.

Steve Alford

Not often does a coach from a major conference leave a school to accept a job at a mid-major university, but that is exactly what Alford did on March 23 when he bolted lowa for New Mexico. Alford had been at lowa since 1999 and was a former player under legendary coach Bob Knight at Indiana in the mid-1980s.

John Beilein

This is the man who made Huggins' departure from K-State possible. Beilein accepted a job at Michigan Tuesday after spending five years at West Virginia. He leaves behind a team that won the National Invitation Tournament championship last week. Huggins will inherit a roster that returns several players, but has few available scholarships — if any.

Dana Altman

Altman spent 13 years at Creighton before leaving for Arkansas earlier this week — sort of. In an unusual sequence of events, Altman reversed course after initially accepting the Razorbacks' coaching job, instead deciding to remain with Creighton. It's safe to say some K-State fans will be holding out hope that Huggins does the same.

EXIT | Huggins still 'wrestling' with decision Wednesday, Weiser says

added he would consider every option for a replacement for Huggins.

"We now have to regroup and begin - again," Weiser said.

Late Wednesday night, Huggins met with Wefald and Weiser to discuss his options. Weiser said when the three ended their meeting at around midnight, he felt there was a better than 50-percent chance Huggins would remain at K-State.

"I asked him, 'Bob, do you think leaving now is the right thing to do?' and he said, 'No," Weiser said. "And then I said, 'How many times in your life have you known what the right thing is to do and not done it?' and he said, 'Never.' That to me was an indication that he was still wrestling with that decision."

Weiser said Huggins agreed to meet with him and Wefald early Thursday morning, but the meeting was pushed back until the afternoon. It was then, Weiser said, Huggins informed him of his decision to leave.

"I felt like he was a very tortured soul," Weiser said. "I felt like he was conflicted in many ways."

Huggins had an opportunity to coach West Virginia five years ago, when the school had an opening in 2002. He decided to stay at Cincinnati, however, until he later resigned in 2005 under pressure from university president Nancy Zimpher.

Weiser said he felt Huggins' resignation at K-State had everything to do with his desire to return to his native Morgantown, W.Va.

"I would have to tell you that what he was dealing with was, 'This might be the last time that I get a chance to go home,'" Weiser said. "I told Bob, 'It is not about whether you should go back home or not. There is a right time for everything, and this isn't the right time. West Virginia will be disappointed if you don't come, but it will be much greater for us.'"

Huggins had a $100,000 buyout in his contract, a small figure compared to that of many other high-profile coaches across the nation. Weiser said he did not think the money was a concern, because he felt Huggins made a firm commitment to K-State when he was hired in March 2006. Weiser also said Huggins never expressed to him that he would consider leaving K-State if the West Virginia job were to come available, and said he expected Huggins to retire a Wildcat.

Weiser said he would not have hired Huggins if he felt lovalty was an issue loyalty was an issue.

"You have to want to be here," Weiser said. "I've said that many times. You can't kind of want to be the coach

- you have to be all in."
Players were not available for comment, but Weiser indicated they were disappointed in Huggins' decision to leave.

"It is a difficult thing for them right now to understand the commitment they made, and now we are starting over," he said. "Believe me, it is very difficult for our kids. We are obviously very concerned about them."

Huggins finished his K-State career with a 23-12 record overall and guided the Wildrats to the National Invitation Tournament, the school's first postseason appearance since 1999.

DEPARTURE | Huggins leaves too many unanswered questions

Wesier said. "I asked him, 'Bob, do you think leaving now is the right thing to do?"

"He said no."

And that, perhaps better than anything else, illuminates the conflict and the contradiction of Bob Huggins. He knows the right thing. He doesn't always do it. Maybe it was the same feeling, that night in the car outside of Cincinnati.

The flashing lights, the smell of alcohol and vomit, the slurred speech and staggering steps. Bob Huggins knows the right thing. He doesn't always do it.

But as Huggins left the airport terminal, none of that mattered anymore. Right and wrong were tangled and complicated, and ultimately irrelevant. Here and now were all that mattered.

Huggins trudged across the runway and climbed aboard the plane.

The propellor began to spin, its steady whir drowning out the sounds of the airport.

The plane taxied down the runway, pcking up speed until its wheel finally broke free from the payement.

Then the slae-gray sky opened up and wallowed Bob Huggins in a swirl of April snowflakes.

Dear Crisis Kurt, Recently, I have become the object of a stalking eye. I awoke late one night to the sound of my name being whispered in my ear by my stalker, who was clinging to my dadder (I sleep in a lofted bed). This person also has been hanging around a lot recently, and I'm start-Ing to get concerned for my health. Please, CK, I need your help

KURT

Dear Simply Irresistible, Since I received your question, your crisis has haunted me night and day. After many hours of research and soul-searching, I have devised some suggestions that will have you sleeping better in no

> 1. You first need to figure out why this person is stalking you. Is it because they really need a friend right now? Maybe they are interested in you romantically, or just have nothing better to do with their time. Whatever the case might be, you need to put yourself in their shoes. (Caution: you and your stalker might not have the same shoe size. Could cause such side effects as shrunken foot or a new viewpoint.)

2. Buy some locks. Although this is obvious, it frequently is overlooked. I would suggest making a trip to your local hardware store to buy several different locks. Install them in your doors, and make sure to keep the keys with you at all times.

By placing this obstacle between you and your stalker, you should finally be able to get a restful night's sleep.

3. Test them. Tell them you are going on a camping trip over the weekend and invite them to join you. When you get to your campsite, fill them in on the overwhelming population of snipes in the surrounding area. Dare them to see if they can catch one alive. While they are off trying to find a snipe, book it back to K-State.

If you see them again, tell them you were waiting for them to get back, but you were forced to leave after a swarm of snipes raided your

As a last resort, you can always pick up and move somewhere else. I hear southeast Manhattan is lovely this time of year.

Remember, take your chill pills and keep those shoelaces tied.

Nelson said Ballard's sometimes acts as an "early press" during significant K-State sporting events because of its ability to print T-shirts instantly.

"Something like this doesn't happen a lot to us," Nelson said.

Ballard employees said they are unsure what to do with the 100 or so "Huggieville" T-shirts displayed at the store.

K-Rock 101.5-FM and the Powercat Illustrated staff might have the answer.

From 6 to 10 a.m. today during K-Rock's morning show, host Cory Dean will collect any Huggins T-shirts or other memorabilia at the Powercat office, 1125 Moro

At the end of the collecmake a joke out of it," said Schmeidler, senior in animal sciences and industry. "We thought that having signatures versus a fee would be a more appropriate route."

Speaking against the amendment, Jim Mosimann, College of Arts and Sciences senator, said the 70-signature amendment would not serve a purpose.

"I don't understand what it's going to accomplish," said Mosimann, junior in political science. "I don't think it's going to be effective."

In other business, Senate members voted 24-17-3 to send an allocation to Aikido Club back to the Allocations Committee. However, the bill died in committee, as it was the last Senate meeting of the term.

"It dies, and for the reasoning that the Allocations Committee will cease to exist after this meeting," said Nick Piper, committee chair and junior in finance.

The bill would have allocated $750 for space rental during the summer to the 11 members of Aikido Club.

Immediately after the final meeting of the 2006-07 Senate term, Matt Wagner and Lydia Peele were sworn in as student body president and vice president, respectively. Senators for the 2007-08 term also were sworn in.

Regents defer maintenance legislation

By Adrianne DeWeese KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the Kansas Legislature regular session ending Tuesday night, deferred maintenance was left with decisions

During the past Kansas legislative session, Kansas Board of Regents officials, K-State university administrators and Student Governing Association members have led efforts in raising awareness about the $660 million deferred maintenance backlog at the six Regents universities.

A short wrap-up veto session of the House and Senate is scheduled to begin April 25. The session will be used to finish any issues that did not get done in the regular session that legislators think should be resolved, said Susan Peterson, K-State's director of governmental relations. The wrap-up session could last between four to seven days, and the entire legislative session can only last 90 days, Peterson said.

Deferred maintenance is "to put off to a future time care of upkeep," according to the Regents Web site. Deferred maintenance also is separated into two cost categories - building renewal costs and utility/infrastructure

Martin to be introduced as K-State's 22nd head basketball coach today

By Jeffrey Rake KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two days before Bob Huggins was introduced as the new head coach at West Virginia last Friday, Garth Gardiner, a 1989 K-State graduate and close friend of Huggins and his assistant Frank Martin, already was preparing for the future.

"I looked Frank in the eye on Wednesday, and I said, 'If Huggs leaves, you gotta stay. It's the only way we can survive this thing," Gardiner said.

"I asked him ... 'If Huggs leaves would you stay?' And he looks at me with a puzzled look on his face and he said, 'You talking about the head coach? Absolutely. That's my dream.

I want to be a head coach. That's all I've dreamed of my whole life is to be a head coach. Absolutely I'd stay."

Martin's dream now is reality.

Athletics Director Tim Weiser announced Friday - just hours after Huggins' press conference in Morgantown, W.Va., ended - that Martin would become the program's 22nd head coach. A press conference is scheduled for 11 a.m. today to formally introduce Martin as Huggins' successor.

Student Governing Association members know how to have fun for a good cause.

SGA and AfterHours, a committee within the Union Program Council, sponsored the Cats for Kids Olympics, a fund-raising event for the K-State Child Development Center on Friday.

The four participating teams - Naked Station, The Vicious Chad, Speech Unlimited and The Flaming Raptors - competed in three main events and a bonus

The first event was the Call Hall brain freeze. Participants were given a bowl of ice cream, and the quickest one to eat it won the event.

"It's an ice cream contest where even the winners lose," said Lucas Maddy, senior in agricultural technology management and agricultural economics and former student body president.

The next was the "Price is Precise," a game in which members of the four teams guessed the prices of K-State merchandise. The third event was a string chase. Each team had a string 172 yards long. and all of the strings were intertwined across the room, Maddy

"It took seven people a half an hour to set up," he said.

Each team selected a member to untangle the string, roll it up and return to the judges to win.

The bonus event, to make up some points, was karaoke. Teams had to select a member to sing for the judges, who were SGA cabinet members.

"We wanted to get the voice of SGA out there," said Amanda Hoffman, 2006-07 chief of staff for SGA cabinet and senior in speech communication. "We wanted to let them know we have fun, too. And we wanted people to know about cabinet."

Hoffman said the cabinet has been planning the event since

ACTIVISTS TRY TO REPLACE EASTER BUNNY WITH KIWI

WELLINGTON, New Zealand - A New Zealand environmental body is targeting the Easter bunny in a renewed war against rabbits, one of the country's worst natural pests.

Environment Canterbury on the country's South Island wants people to come up with an alternative Easter symbol as part of a campaign to highlight the damage caused by the non-native pest.

"We did have a similar competition a number of years ago and we came up with the Easter Kiwi," Oldfield said, referring to the flightless bird that is the country's national bird.

Rabbits were introduced in the late 19th century as part of a fur trade that never was established, but they bred at such a rate that they infested large parts throughout the country, eating sparse vegetation and causing widespread erosion.

ZAMBONI DRIVER SKATES BY DRUNKEN DRIVING LAW

NEWARK, N.J. - It's not drunken driving in New Jersey if it involves a Zamboni.

A judge ruled the four-ton ice-rink-grooming machines are not motor vehicles because they are not useable on highways and cannot carry passengers.

Zamboni operator John Peragallo had been charged with drunken driving in 2005 after a fellow employee at the Mennen Sports Arena in Morristown, N.J., told police the machine was speeding and nearly crashed into the boards.

Police said Peragallo's blood alcohol level was 0.12 percent. A level of 0.08 is considered legally drunk in New Jersey.

Peragallo, 64, testified at his trial that he did drink beer and vodka, but not until after he had groomed the ice.

HELLS ANGELS REUNION HAS EXTRA POLICE ON DUTY

OAKLAND, Calif. - With some of its members old enough to collect retirement pay, a party at Hells Angels headquarters is no celebration for the police.

As the Oakland chapter planned to mark the 50th anniversary of its founding this weekend, police put extra officers on duty Thursday, even as they downplayed the chance of trouble from a club with a long history of run-ins with the law.

"I anticipate it's going to be one of the biggest events the club has had," said George Christie, Ventura chapter president.

Christie said the event is drawing members to Oakland from all over the world.

The motorcycle club's Oakland chapter, best known for providing security at the 1969 Altamont Free Concert where a fan was killed by a Hells Angel, is expected to have 600 to 800 bikers at the event, police said.

The Hells Angels were formed in Fontana in 1948. By the '60s, the club was synonymous with outlaw biker counterculture.

EGGstravaganza offers 'educational' Easter holiday celebration

By Monica Castro KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite chilly weather, Manhattan residents came to celebrate a not-so-typical Easter at Sunset Zoological Park Saturday morning.

Hundreds of children and parents attended EGGstravaganza, an annual event during which patrons can learn about egg-laying animals through various egg-themed games and educational programs.

Zoo employees wanted to put a spin on the typical Easter celebration and help bring out the community, said Ella Todd, marketing assistant for the zoo and junior in marketing.

EGGstravaganza has drawn more than 1,000 guests in the past, and usually brings between 800 and 1,000 guests, depending on the weather.

Todd said adult volunteers, or docents, helped run the egg booths and games and worked behind the scenes filling eggs with candy for the games.

The egg-themed games were aimed to teach children about various species that lay eggs and what their eggs look like. Children also could get their pictures taken with Flopsy the Easter bunny and have their faces painted like certain animals.

Karen Watson, Manhattan resident, said she and her family were going to visit the zoo eventually, and decided EGGstravaganza would be a great time.

"We are definitely going to come back," Watson said.

Children and parents had two chances during the day to enjoy the Live Animal Ambassador program, in which they learned about various egg-laying animals and had the chance to pet them.

Rachel Soash, zoo curator of education, brought out the animals and discussed how many eggs each one laid. She also gave a quick summary about their natural habitats, what they eat and how they are beneficial to the environment.

One animal Soash introduced was a Madagascar hissing cockroach. She told the audience the roaches develop egg cases on their backs and then stick the eggs in holes along their bodies. They incubate the eggs inside of the egg cases, and when they are ready to give birth, about 60 eggs hatch.

Another animal Soash presented was a red-eyed tree frog named Rana. The children could not touch the frog, but could see it through a glass box. Redeyed tree frogs can lay about 200 eggs, she said. To hide from their predators, they spend most of their time underneath leaves, and when they feel they are in danger, they open their bright red eyes and display heir colorful bodies to scare away preda-

Children also had the opportunity to talk to staff members, who carried egg-laying animals.

"The purpose of the program was to educate and teach people what to do to make a difference," Soash said.

Members of the marketing and education department at Sunset Zoo started planning the event in February to narrow down which games and animals to showcase for the event, Soash said.

Other thematic events will take place throughout the year to educate parents and children about problems in the environment. Water Safari and Earth Day are coming soon, and aim to teach about water and environmental conservation.

International Week events lend opportunities to learn about other cultures

By Brie Handgraaf KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This week is the International Week Celebration, an opportunity to make new friends and broaden one's horizons. Students will have the chance to learn about the vast cultures represented in classrooms every day, said Chen-Hua Wu, an international week coordinator and graduate student in business administration. "I think it's a great opportunity for the American students and also the international students to see other cultures and to learn a little bit more about their own cultures," Wu said. "Learning from different people from different cultures is the whole point of international week."

Throughout the week, the International Coordinating Council, along with Union Program Council and other campus organizations, will be host to different events in an effort to raise cultural awareness at K-State.

"International week is a time to display the many cultures of the world and share that with everyone by showing traditional clothes, music and dance, art, traditions and more," said Sarah Mitts, vice president of the ICC and senior in management. "The cultural exhibition will have tables filled with various handicrafts from different countries, and the dance lessons will give people an opportunity to truly engage in learning about another country's culture by trying to learn some of their dances.

"And the talent show is an amazing display of dance and musical performances from around the world."

Hit | Hanging on to recruits

By promoting Frank Martin to head coach and Dalonte Hill to associate head coach, K-State kept its No. 1 recruiting class together. This could have ended badly, with players bailing out faster than Bob Huggins. Fortunately, the hire will allow the Wildcats to continue building momentum.

Miss | Untested coaches

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' move reeks of desperation. It probably would have been a better idea to keep Martin and Hill on board as assistants and then hire a more experienced candidate to fill the head coach vacancy. Nothing against Martin and Hill, but if K-State is keeping them to retain good players, who's the boss, the players or the coaches?

Hit | International week

International Week is a great opportunity to learn about other cultures and students. Between the fashion show, dance lessons and international parade, students can participate in entertaining activities throughout the week. It also is a great time to score some free food.

Miss | Cold weather

It's nice to look out the window and see the sun shining and flowers blooming, but it's depressing to be hit with a blast of frigid air upon opening the door. It's almost the middle of April. Someone turn on the heater already.

Hit | "The Ten Commandments"

One of the best things about Easter weekend is the annual opportunity to watch Charlton Heston on television in "The Ten Commandments." However, we think it's strange to feature a film that doesn't include Jesus on a holiday that celebrates his resurrection.

Miss | Gas prices

We hate to sound like our grandparents, but when we were young, gas cost less than a dollar. As underpaid college students, our wallets take a beating at every turn, and rising fuel costs are just another burden we could do without.

Blood donation a great way to provide assistance to others

Next week, don't be surprised if you see a giant blood drop running around campus (which might create some questions on campus tours).

It's that time of the semester. What time, you ask? Time for the K-State Blood Drive.

All next week, April 16-20, the American Red Cross will be on campus harvesting your precious blood for donation to people across the region.

SPENCER

The Red Cross needs about 500 blood donors each day just to supply Kansas and north Oklahoma; your blood will make a difference.

I know what you're thinking: you hate needles, you faint at the sight of blood, it takes too long, etc. In the short three years I've helped with the drive, I've heard all the excuses about why not to donate. My excuse used to be that I wasn't going to pass out my hard-earned blood left and right — until I was notified that blood replenishes itself.

Anyway, the point is, whether or not you think it is, your blood is needed, big time.

Here are some quick facts on the need for blood donors from the Red Cross: every two seconds, someone in the United States needs blood, and one in 10 people entering a hospital needs blood.

The average adult has between 10 and 12 pints of blood. Blood donors give one pint of blood each time they donate, which can affect three different people. Each pint can be broken down into three separate components – red blood cells, platelets, and plasma – so different patients can benefit from different parts of another's blood.

If and when you decide to donate, you will read through a set of pamphlets so you can determine whether or not you are eligible to begin the donating process. Red Cross volunteers will test your blood, and if all checks out, you will be able to donate.

Obviously, not all who apply can end up as donors – low iron, tattoos, body weight or international travel keep some from giving. But trust me: most everyone on this campus is eligible. About 60 percent of the country's population can give blood, but only 5 percent actually does.

You can donate from 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. April 16-19 and from 8:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m April 20 at the K-State Student Union. You also can donate from 3 to 8 p.m. April 16 in the Union and at the Peters Recreation Complex, or from 3 to 8 p.m. April 17-19 in

I want to encourage all K-State students to set aside some time this week to help out a great cause. Let's not only try to achieve this year's goal, but surpass it.

Put your fears and worries aside. Go with a friend – just don't look at the needle, and give the gift of life. If nothing else, everyone gets a free T-shirt.

If anything, giving blood is easier than those credit-card applications.

AN EASTER IN COMMON

By Demetrios THE NEW YORK TIMES

Today, Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Protestant Christians have the wonderful opportunity to celebrate Easter together on the same date. To many, that idea might sound natural, since the celebration of Easter speaks to the most central aspect of the Christian faith, the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. The phenomenon happens only every few years. Most years, the date of Easter observed by Eastern and Western Christians varies from one to four weeks. The explanation is complex - a matter of calendrical calculations and astronomical applications based upon the lunar cycle. Whenever a common celebration of Easter does occur, it constitutes a blessing.

With that in mind, I would like to point out a remarkable occurrence in the history of the long walk toward Christian unity: the visit last November of Pope Benedict XVI to the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, in Istanbul, at the invitation of Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians.

THE MIDDLE EAST TIMES

Iran, which during the past two weeks appeared about to go to war with the West over the fate of 15 British sailors and marines, suddenly and unexpectedly offered all the captives amnesty and freedom. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who just a few weeks ago spoke of destroying Israel, said the Islamic republic was releasing the British naval personnel as a goodwill gesture at this time of holy days: Islam's feast of the Prophet, Christian Easter and the Jewish Passover.

Television cameras beamed images of the news conference around the world, remaining focused on Ahmadinejad as the 15 sailors thanked him for his intervention in bringing about their release.

Games could aid political decision-making process

A single click, and several thousand people suddenly were evicted. Their homes were turned to rubble, eyesores upon the residential zones surrounding them.

A roadway soon took their places, carrying streams of cars between work and home

Buffered on either side by parks, it allowed tens of thousands to populate previously unused tracts of land.

– SimCity, to be exact – I still felt kind of guilty afterward. Who is to say I wouldn't do the same if given the chance in real life?

Luckily for my conscience, that's likely to remain a mere possibility. Most city planning is done in a collaborative atmosphere, muddled by enough outside factors to make it nearly impossible to single-handedly pull off.

Robert Moses, the once shadow-ruler of New York City, did so in the middle of the 20th century, and his uncanny accumulation of power to that end was captured in the appropriately titled epic biography, "The Power Broker."

But we have learned since those times, and Jane Jacobsinspired, pedestrian-friendly, community-revitalization groups swarm any attempts to dictatorially wield influence.

It is not just city planning that has become more democratic; nearly all recent large-scale projects have been contingent upon the will of the masses.

As public awareness and concern rise about issues like climate change, so does the effort demanded by those voters. And that is before the special interest groups get involved, lobbying politicians with contributions and favors.

The Freedom Tower was envisioned as a triumphant response to Sept. 11, as vague as that sounds. And the planning committee only made things worse, turning what could have been a really cool building into anything

Games like SimCity and The Sims take a collaborative process and compress it into one you control.

After all, who would want to play a game like "Congress Five: Lobby Harder?"

But though the special interests always will pull the process in dozens of different directions, there is still reason to hope the voters won't.

In most cases, we have intuitions that guide us in deciding the best solution. Called heuristics, or "common sense," these are generally shared and coalesce public opinion into a handful of options.

A lot of contentious subjects like eminent domain or climate change don't have any common intuitions.

But in a suspiciously convenient turn of events, the same games that delude us about the process could, in turn, partially

Games provide us a way to test solutions and form intuitions regarding processes most of us don't have much contact with.

In the case of my opening example, most people do not have the attention span to continuously follow the construction of a new roadway through planning, construction and maintenance phases.

Will Wright designed both SimCity and The Sims and now serves as the Serious Gaming Guru for much of the industry. Raised on these games, a new wave of game designers are creating games and toys to simulate a bunch of things, including entire galaxies in the upcoming Spore.

Eventually, we might see games seriously accepted into the curriculum as an education tool.

In the meantime, it makes a good response to, "Johnny, stop playing those video games and do your homework!"

HARARE, Zimbabwe - In an Easter message pinned to church bulletin boards around the country, Zimbabwe's Roman Catholic bishops called on President Robert Mugabe to leave office or face "open revolt" from those suffering under his government.

The letter, titled "God Hears the Cries of the Oppressed." was the most critical pastoral message since Zimbabwe won independence from Britain in 1980 and Mugabe assumed leadership of the country.

BAGHDAD - The powerful Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr ordered his militiamen on Sunday to redouble their battle to oust American forces and argued that Iraq's army and police should join him in defeating their archenemy.

Separately, six American soldiers were killed, including three who died in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad.

Security remained so tenuous in the capital on the eve of the fourth anniversary of the U.S. capture of Baghdad that Iraq's military declared a 24hour ban on all vehicles in the capital starting at 5 a.m. Monday. The government quickly reinstated Monday as a holiday, just a day after it had decreed that April 9 no longer would be a day off.

So Huggins left — let's just focus on the future

I was born right here in Wildcat country. I was raised wearing purple, but as a K-Stater, I am unusual because I don't usually pay attention to or support sports. Sorry, but I couldn't care less

However, I find it hard to keep my mouth shut about all of this Huggins news. I am disappointed in K-Staters. Why the foolishness? Everyone is outraged by Huggins' departure. I simply ask, why?

The man was fired from his last job. He was a man with a media image - an image he wanted to build. I don't believe he had any concern for K-State. He refused to wear our school colors, and made all sorts of demands of us. He wanted the student body to support him, to worship him. Congratulations Huggins - you won.

What happened to having faith in the players, those students who work hard to play ball and go to school? Remember them?

Frankly, I am disappointed by all of the whining going on around campus. I am tired of hearing about Huggins. I would be impressed if everyone would be mature and move on. By carrying it out, you simply add to the press coverage. Forget Huggins, and use the opportunity to support the players and the school.

Allow me to have a little pride in my school. Yeah. K-State fell for his little game. Yeah, everyone is mad. He has all the publicity he wants, so how about denying him his wish? Just forget about it.

Yellow flags rightfully come across as anti-war

Editor,

This letter is in reference to the "Memorial honors members of the military who died in Iraq War" article in the Collegian on March 26.

The students quoted throughout the article discussed how they wanted to "put things in perspective" and wanted "people to visualize how many have died." I agree. I think the placement of the 3,494 yellow flags across campus was an influential and attention-grabbing way of telling people to stop and think about what's going on in our world.

I find it extremely interesting how at the beginning of the article, Jeff Stilley, K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice president, stated, "I want to stress that this isn't an anti-war protest." How can such a powerful display of death and tragedy not be an anti-war demonstration?

Whether or not you support the Iraq War, we should be questioning why so many of our brothers, fathers, sisters or cousins are dying.

For many, it was a war in which we overthrew a cruel dictator and are now creating (or forcing) a democracy for the Iraqi people.

However, others view this war as immoral and based on lies from our government, which led to the deaths of thousands of soldiers and hundreds of thousands of Iraqi civilians.

The immediate rejection of the title "anti-war demonstration" shows how afraid we are to question our government and what's really happening during this "operation of freedom."

The thousands of bright yellow flags that lined our sidewalks for a week represented loss and hopefully provoked some thought.

Obviously, they are telling us something. What exactly? You decide.

Redevelopment of downtown area more than a decade in the making

By Whitney Hodgin KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The gaping holes downtown where the redevelopment is in full swing can jar the average Manhattan resident, but the project actually has been more than a decade in the making.

The city commission moved in favor of "sprucing up" the southeast comer of Manhattan where motorists exit Kansas Highway 177 back in 1997. They felt the railroad station looked shabby and gave visitors the wrong impression of the city. The future of local retail also was discussed, and concerns focused on reducing the need for residents to travel to larger cities to do serious shopping.

"We anticipate that with the redevelopment, visitors will stay longer and spend more money," Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, told the Collegian in March.

In July, commissioners discussed the idea of turning that area into a Tax Increment Financing district. TIF arranges · for developers to pay for redevelopment, the sum of which the city would reimburse with property tax income over a period of 20 years. TIF districts allow for eminent domain as a last resort for developers to acquire all property needed.

This concerned citizens, who remembered Manhattan Town Center was built on a TIF district using the highly unpopular condemnation 10 years before, but Karen Davis, then-director of community development, was quoted in the Manhattan Mercury saying, "the city is not planning to seize land or buy out property owners in the area."

In August 1998, city commissioners voted to establish the area as a redevelopment district and hire a long-range planner to address issues like the development of downtown, the availability of housing and the general direction of growth. The term "Downtown Tomorrow" was the project's optimistic headliner.

Soon after, a panel of local officials and community members formed to discuss Manhattan's future

In July 2000, First National Development of Chicago proposed two separate TIF districts to commissioners - one on Third Street and one on the edge of the east-side industrial park to make room for residential houses and a shopping strip. The firm said the TIFs were necessary because of the high cost of purchasing the land, razing buildings and environmental cleanup.

By 2003, "Downtown Tomorrow" had morphed into the Downtown Redevelopment Plan, and Dial Realty Corporation, based out of Omaha, Neb., led the project. It also expressed interest in purchasing Manhattan Town Center, which had been on and off the market since 1999.

Commissioners approved assistance in the form of STAR Bonds to fund redevelopment. At that time, planners were prepared for the inclusion of any Bath & Beyond, Dress Barn, an arts district, a visitors' center not come to a agreement with Dial Realty in terms of compensation.

"This is what we'll do if they don't come to an agreement with Dial," said mayor Bruce Snead said in September 2006. "The plan is based on a federal law and figures used when Manhattan Town Center was developed."

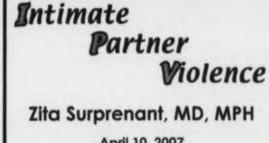

Two redevelopment areas still were in existence by 2007. The area within Bluemont Avenue, Fourth Street, Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Leavenworth Street comprise the north redevelopment area, while the area within Pierre Street. Fourth Street, and Fort Riley Boulevard form the south redevelopment area. Assistant city manager Jason Hilgers reported the total cost for both sites as being close to $194 million.

Property owners were offered 25 percent more than the appraisal value of their homes in addition to relocation aid. Dial negotiated agreements for all but seven of the 23 properties within the south redevelopment district, and condemnation proceedings are underway.

"Of the seven that are left, there are a lot of meetings going on, probably only one or two that have really been less communicative," Welstead said. "But we keep chiseling away, and we keep trying and working pretty hard to get it."

Leadership limbo

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 11 a.m. today, Frank Martin officially will have one of the toughest jobs in college sports. When Martin is announced as K-State's 22nd men's basketball coach during today's press conference, he'll begin one of the most scrutinized and overanalyzed coaching positions in recent memory.

DUNN

I'm glad I'm not in his position.

Martin's first order of business will be to secure the nation's top-ranked recruiting class, even though five days ago, all four of the players in that class thought they'd be playing for a man with 590 career wins and 16 NBA players on his record. It looks as though Martin already has secured those players, so cross that one off the

After that, he'll have to get all of that talent to mesh together into something experts like to call a "team." Forming a team out of a bunch of players who have always been stars is much easier said than done.

Next, he'll be challenged with making thousands of people forget about a man they thought was going to save the program and convincing that same community it is not cursed when it comes to competing in sports.

That's no small task for a man who just a few years ago was coaching high-school basketball in Florida.

I'm not saying it can't be done. In fact, I think there's a decent chance it will be done. But that doesn't mean it won't be difficult. Whether Martin has enough savvy, intelligence and, well, honesty to handle the position remains to be seen. That last quality is one his predecessor particularly seemed to struggle with.

Not that he's looking for my advice, but Martin needs to be his own person. He's not going to be Bob Huggins, so he shouldn't try to be. Based on all the stories, it sounds like Martin will be a fiery and vocal head coach. That's good, because he'll need that; he'll need to make it easy for the K-State fans to fall in love with him and his team. He'll need to get his players to buy into his philosophy, even though he's never coached at the collegiate level.

If Martin can get his team to play

A Huggins recruit, Bennett's future at KSU in question

By Jeffrey Rake

The first order of business for new K-State men's basketball coach Frank Martin was to secure the Wildcats' top-rated recruiting class for the 2007

According to several reports, K-State is expected to retain most - if not all - of its recruits for next season. That includes Michael Beasley, Rivals. com's No. 1 prospect.

But what about players like 7-foot-3 freshman Jason Bennett, who came to Manhattan specifically to play for former coach Bob Huggins?

With Huggins gone, will Bennett, who acknowledged he was homesick several times throughout the year, also leave Manhattan?

Don't expect an immediate decision.

Rex Morgan, Bennett's high-school coach at Arlington Country Day School in Jacksonville, Fla., said by phone that Bennett has other priorities for the time being.

"Right now, he's concerned with making sure his academics are where they need to be, and I think he'll be set to visit with Frank in the near future," Morgan said.

Bennett, who played sparingly late in the year, averaged 1.9 points and 2.6 rebounds.

However, he failed to see the floor in eight of K-State's 35 games.

"I don't think anybody from Jason on down to the K-State staff was completely satisfied with the year that happened with him," Morgan said. "But this was awful sudden, and a lot of people want to make quick decisions. I think it's best to sleep on it for two or three days and then visit the issue."

Wildcats win 1, lose 2 in series against Missouri

By Ryne Witt KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In Sunday's rubber game against Missouri, K-State seemingly had the game won going into the top of the ninth up 6-4 and with junior Daniel Edwards on the mound.

Edwards had not given up a run in 21 2/3 innings, but with two outs and two on he gave up a triple to Missouri's Brock Bond that drove in two runs.

K-State went on to lose the game in 12 innings

The winning run came off a home run to right field by Trevor Coleman in the top of the 12th. The home run came off a pitch by freshman Tyler Ruch to make it 7-6.

"He made one mistake, and they got it," coach Brad Hill said.

The game was not all bad for Ruch, who started as the designated hitter and hit his first home run as a Wildcat.

In the bottom of the third, Ruch came up with two outs and one on and hit a home run over the right-field fence to make the game 4-3 in favor of

There was a lot of what-ifs today, but that is baseball." Ruch said.

Missouri scored first with three runs in the first two innings, but the Wildcats responded with two runs in the bottom of the second. Sophomore Ben Hornbeck was the starting pitcher. He went four innings and gave up four runs off seven hits. Relief pitcher sophomore Todd Vogel came in for Hornbeck and pitched four hitless innings.

"I thought Vogel was outstanding,"

The win moved Missouri to 24-9 and 6-3 in the Big 12.

The loss made K-State 22-10 and 4-5 in the Big 12.

FRIDAY

In the first game of the series, the Wildcats used their bats and arms to dominate the Tigers, 12-0.

K-State scattered 16 hits against four Missouri pitchers.

"We played extremely aggressive and hard today," said coach Brad Hill.

Lead-off hitter junior Derek Bunker was the best hitter for the Wildcats, going 5-for-6 and driving in four RBI. He also hit his first home run of the season in the bottom of the third to get the scoring started.

Junior starter Brad Hutt and sophomore reliever Justin Murray combined for a shutout.

Hutt (6-1) went six innings, striking out seven and giving up only six hits. He started out strong, striking out the first two batters of the game. Hutt's best inning might have been the fifth, in which he struck out three of the first four batters.

"I don't think he had his greatest command today, but he competed really hard today," Hill said.

Murray was equally impressive, giving up no hits in his three innings of work. He struck out four on his way to his first save of the season.

Other Wildcat standouts on the offensive end were sophomore Jordan Cruz, sophomore Byron Wiley and Zagone (6-0) finished the game giving up one hit, four walks and 11 strikeouts. "He threw a great game and really

All of Missouri's runs came in the seventh. The first was a home run to right field by John McKee off Wildcat pitcher junior Chase Bayuk. Later in the inning, Lee Fischer drove in two runs with a single to center field.

Bayuk (2-3) pitched well compared to his last outing, in which he faced Texas Tech and gave up eight runs off six hits in 2 1/3 innings of work.

This time, he went six innings and gave up two runs and four hits. It just wasn't good enough to match Zagone.

CHICO, Calif. - Elsie McLean thought she might have lost her ball on the par-3, 100yard fourth hole at Bidwell Park. Instead, the 102-year-old Chico woman became the oldest golfer ever to make a hole-in-one on a regulation course. Because of the slope of the green, McLean and her partners couldn't see where her ball landed after she teed off.

"Where's my ball?" McLean asked. Her friends, Elizabeth Rake and Kathy Crowder, found it in the cup.

Roommate rummage

Personality, communication, trust important aspects when searching for good match

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Henry Marquardt went through two college roommates before he found one with whom he could get along, but once he figured out a way to beat the system, he held on tight.

Marquardt, senior in finance, now has had the same residence-hall roommate for three years.

"It's all about respect and what is more functional," Marquardt said. "You don't need a roommate that you can go out with on the weekends. What you need is someone you can deal with on a day-to-day basis."

Marquardt is in his second year as a resident assistant for Haymaker Hall and said he uses his experiences to help other students handle their own roommate conflicts.

Going away to school is the first space-sharing experience for many college students, particularly freshmen.

Some students are used to having their own rooms and bathrooms and must adjust to a roommate and community bathrooms.

When deciding whether to live in the residence halls or in an apartment or house, several characteristics should be kept in mind when considering how to find the perfect roommate. PERSONALITY

Though opposites attract, similarities also can be a significant ally in the battle to live in peace.

After answering an advertisement about a room vacancy, Stephen Wiemers, freshman in pre-professional business administration, moved into an off-campus house at the beginning of the school year with two other K-State students.

Though he had not met his new roommates before agreeing to live with them, Wiemers said their personalities have meshed well, and so far there have been no conflicts.

"What drew me to them was that they seemed very responsible," Wiemers said. "I could also tell that they were tidy and neat, something I definitely appreciated."

At the start of college, some students take advantage of their new-found freedom and decide to begin partying. Wiemers said this was not his preference and was glad to find roommates who had the same kinds of lifestyle choices he had.

"I don't really drink and party," Wiemers said, "so when I found out my new roommates weren't all that into it either, I knew this was going to work."

Unfortunately, not everyone is as lucky as Wiemers when it comes to immediate roommate bliss.

Alli Mitchell, junior in social work, also lives off campus with one roommate, but she said she first experienced several years of living with someone she did not fit well

Mitchell said she met her first roommate though a potluck setup in Ford Hall her freshman year and soon learned that too many personality differences can lead to problems.

Mitchell described herself as responsible with a strong work ethic, but she said her former roommate was quite the opposite, which bothered her.

"She is my great friend, but we are just not made to live together," Mitchell said. "There are too many differences between us."

Similar to this, some also said living with close friends is not a good option.

"Rooming with either a best friend from high school or even someone you knew very well before college can lead to tension in your living environment," said Brian Jaworski, Haymaker Hall resident life coordinator. "True sides are revealed, and my best advice to cope with this would be to communicate with your roommate."

COMMUNICATION

Jaworski said he has handled several situations in the residence halls during his time as RLC and said most of the problems are generated by a lack of communication between roommates.

He said he recommends sitting down immediately with one's roommate to set up boundaries on issues like visitors, bedtimes and the use of personal property.

"Communicating is key, especially for younger students living in the dorms," Jaworski said. "When there is a problem, it's much easier to just fill out the paperwork and move somewhere else, but learning to communicate and get along teaches you how to function in life."

As an RA, Marquardt said he helps roommates resolve conflict through conversation. Talking the situation over calmly and respectfully will ease frustration and resentment, he said.

Also, students should acknowledge opposing viewpoints and let roommates know they realize the issue is important and wish to cooperate, Marquardt said.

"Come into these situations with an open mind," he said. "Don't limit yourself to your expectations."

It also is helpful for students to let roommates know where they are for safety reasons, especially when walking home late at night from or work.

TRUSTWORTHINESS

MacKayla Dougherty, junior in apparel and textiles, is a member of Pi Beta Phi sorority and resides off campus in the sorority house. Dougherty said she now has two other roommates in the house, but the sorority members switch

This helps them to develop deeper friendships with sorority sisters and become more comfortable with each other, Dougherty said.

However, adjusting to new roommates and their characteristics can be challenging.

Dougherty said she has had to deal with a few roommates borrowing personal items like clothing without asking first.

But overall, she said her experiences switching roommates not only has been successful, giving her the opportunity to meet and grow closer to peers, but also has given her the chance to escape an uncomfortable living situation after only one semester.

Jordan Robbins, freshman in engineering, lives in Marlatt Hall with one roommate.

He said he was assigned his roommate through potluck. Robbins said he feels trust

Maryland considers mixed-sex housing trial

By Kristi Tousignant
THE DIAMONDBACK (U. MARYLAND)

COLLEGE PARK, Md. -Residence Halls Association members at the University of Maryland voted unanimously Tuesday night to recommend students be allowed to live in dorm rooms and campus apartments with members of the opposite sex on a trial ba-

The decision follows more than five years of debate among students who represent on-campus residents, and represents the first concrete step toward what some view as a controversial living arrangement for colleges and universities. The vote is meant to influence Resident Life officials, who will make a preliminary decision on the nal say.

But the vote, which follows a study commissioned by Resident Life that found 77 percent of the 1,000 students surveyed were interested in living in the same apartment as or next door to the opposite sex, sends a strong message to any officials that have issue, but who do not have fi-final say over the change.

If Resident Life follows the recommendation, the University Senate and President Dan Mote would be required to approve the proposal before sending it to the University System of Maryland's governing body, the Board of Regents. Residence hall leaders expect the entire process to take about a year, but many student-related issues have lingered in the senate for years.

"I think it is a progressive step for our university, and whatever objections there are to the issue, I feel like they can be worked out in a positive way," said RHA spokesperson Matt Van Sant. "It shines a bright light on the university."

The RHA decision does not encompass the entire campus, however. The resolution recommends the change take place on a trial of unspecified length in The Courtyards and South Campus Commons only. They chose the two locations, which feature apartment-style layouts, because students surveyed said that while they supported mixed-sex housing, they prefer separate bathrooms for each sex.

"It should be an interesting dynamic," said Matt Verghese, junior in electrical engineering and RHA member. "The trial will give us an idea of how it works. Then we can decide whether to keep going or scale back."

Although a majority of students support mixed-sex housing on this campus, the policy still is considered somewhat controversial among university officials nationwide. Only one of this university's peer institutions, the University of California-Berkeley, now has mixed-sex housing policies. Peer institutions are universities designated by Mote for being similar in size and mission to this university and thus comparable.

Coincidentally, Mote was once a top administrator at Berkeley, although he has not said publicly whether he would support mixed-sex housing policies here.

Few other public universities support mixed-sex housing, although the policy has gained approval more frequently among private institutions such as New York University.

Members of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered community also have been highly supportive of the policy, particularly because same-sex housing situations can be uncomfortable for transgendered students, LGBT Equity director Luke Jensen said.

"Their physical sex does not align with their gender," Jensen said. "Someone could be assigned housing based on sex, but that might not be how they identify or present themselves. It creates a problem."

But RHA members said their motivations came from a more progressive sense among students across the campus who saw no reason for the sexes to be separated.

At Tuesday night's meeting, few RHA members declined to express their personal opinion on the issue, saying they relied heavily on the survey results in casting their vote.

But Karen Isenhart, an author of the recommendation, called mixed-sex housing "a great idea" that, if passed, would give students "an alternative option."

"I think it's great everyone was so supportive," she said. "A handful of schools have it already. Since it got such positive response rates, it shows students had a lot of interest."

Students damage KU dorms

UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN (U. KANSAS)

LAWRENCE - Fire alarms are not the main problem in the University of Kansas' Mc-Collum Hall anymore. Residence halls have become a haven for inappropriate – sometimes illegal – behavior, and this semester definitely has had its share. "I've seen used condoms there a lot," said freshman

Talal Alsahli. "They put them in the ceiling."

Alsahli said he has seen other strange things in Mc-Collum this year. On his cell phone, Alsahli had a picture saw on the eighth floor.

Freshman Tariq Musa said he expected to see such behavior in residence halls because of soiled underwear that he it could be boring otherwise.

Alsahli and Musa said people also have urinated and defecated in the elevators.

Jennifer Wamelink, interim associate director for resident life for the Department of Student Housing, said major incidents like these are isolated.

"We don't have a real repeated problem," Wamelink said. "But everyone loses when students make the choice to damage property and then don't come forward."

She said the protocol for solving issues in the residence halls was to first try to find the culprit. If the guilty party does not come forward, the Department of Student Housing must absorb the cost of the damage.

Wamelink said this would raise the department's cost of maintenance, and thus, the cost of room and board for students.

In GSP-Corbin Hall, students tampering with firesafety equipment. Wamelink said many fire extinguishers have been set off without anyone taking responsibility.

Wamelink said any tampering of fire-safety equipment could involve calling the police, and the department always replaced the equipment.

Eddy Tavio, a freshman and McCollum resident, said damage in his hall was a constant problem, but someone always took care of it.

"Almost every weekend, it is trashed," Tavio said. "Vomiting, ripping papers, but we don't have to meet about it. Usually, the RAs take care of it, or the custodial staff."

New software aids university information sharing system

By Dena Bunnel KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Universities across the Midwest are being connected securely through a type of software known as Shibboleth.

Shibboleth is a software used on the World Wide Web to help organizations share information and resources with authorized users and to protect against unauthorized users, said Rahul Deshmukh, graduate student in software engineering and technical consultant for the Great Plains Network.

GPN is a networking and research organization of public universities in seven states in the Midwest dedicated to supporting research and education through the use of advanced networking technology, according to the network's Web site. The GPN staff, including Deshmukh, is located at K-State.

The purpose of Shibboleth is to allow people who are not members of an organization but are related to it through a larger resource-sharing organization to access the company's Web site without having to maintain databases on each Web site.

In the case of GPN, Shibboleth allows a GPN member from one university to access certain information from another university's Web site after a chain of authorizations takes place.

GPN became involved with Shibboleth in June 2004 as a way to connect its member universities across the Midwest, said Greg Monaco, GPN's executive director.

GPN has set up its own information server and is in the process of configuring the identity provider, which should be up and running by Tuesday, Deshmukh said.

Other universities are configuring their own identity providers so the GPN Shibboleth system will be fully functional within two to three years, Deshmukh said.

'Creative technologies like Shibboleth allow researchers, educators and students to access an array of resources from neighboring universities over the Internet and allow the development of a regionally self-sufficient, information-sharing environment," Monaco said.

Shibboleth works by allowing a user to request access to a Web site, known as the service provider. If the service provider does not recognize the user, it will redirect the user to a

A WAYF, or "Where Are You From," is a database server that holds all the information for a group of organizations, which have agreed to share information. The GPN WAYF holds information about each of the 21 GPN member universities.

The WAYF will display the list of member organizations, and users can select the one to which they belong. Users are redirected to the login page of their home organization, the identity provider, where they sign in as a verified member.

The identity provider passes the user's attributes to the service provider. Based on these attributes, like whether the user is a student or a professor, the service provider determines whether or not the user gains access to the Web site and what level of access they receive.

According to a GPN report, the benefits of Shibboleth include the ability of institutions to share resources with each other in a secure way by exchanging attributes instead of storing the user's log in credentials at each site. Because there is no need to maintain a user database at each Web site, security is enhanced because only one account exists for all resources, and user IDs do not have to be used to access a resource, maintaining privacy.

However, some problems arise with Shibboleth, Deshmukh said. The biggest downside is the overhead management required.

The trust relationship required between universities for the technology to work is not always easy to obtain. Adding new universities to the service provider also can be complicated and take time.

Additionally, no logout exists on Shibboleth; however, this will be included in future versions, Deshmukh said.

The states in the Great Plains Network include Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma, North Dakota and South Dakota

Lawrence ordinance wouldn't violate same-sex marriage amendment

By John Hanna THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. - A proposed Lawrence ordinance allowing same-sex and unmarried heterosexual couples to register their partnerships with the city wouldn't violate the Kansas Constitution's ban on gay marriage, Attorney General Paul Morrison said Friday.

Morrison's legal opinion isn't binding, but the Lawrence City Commission had been waiting for his guidance before considering the ordinance. Early discussions about it led a conservative legislator to introduce a bill banning domestic partnership registries statewide.

A constitutional amendment adopted by voters in April 2005 declares that only unions between one man and one woman can be recognized as marriages in Kansas. It also says no other relationship is entitled to "the rights or incidents of marriage."

Morrison said the Lawrence ordinance allows couples only to register their relationships with the city and doesn't extend any legal rights normally associated with marriage.

"The ordinance does not permit something forbidden by the marriage amendment," Morrison wrote in his opinion.

However, the attorney general said that the proposed ordinance contains a flaw that could cause a court to strike it down. It would permit couples living outside Lawrence to register, something Morrison said could exceed the city's power to govern affairs within its limits.

"Should the city of Lawrence impose a city residency requirement, we believe that the ordinance would pass muster," Morrison wrote.

It isn't clear how aggressively the city commission will pursue a registry. This week, voters elected two new members to the five-person commission, and a decision won't occur until after they take office next week, said outgoing commissioner Mike Rundle, a registry supporter who did not seek re-election.

"It was our intent to make this process and policy such that it was not in violation of the constitutional amendment," Rundle said. "Our policy is not going to put any requirement on any private firms that they shall provide domestic partner ben-

The registry would help one partner obtain health coverage and other benefits from the other partner's employer, Rundle said. Companies extending such benefits often accept registration as proof of an ongoing relationship and require more detailed documentation without it, he said.

Morrison's staff said his opinion shouldn't be interpreted as endorsing domestic partnership registries

"This is an analysis of the law as it is currently written and not a policy statement," spokeswoman Ashley Anstaett said.

Gay rights supporters praised Morrison's decision. Tom Witt, chairman of the Equality Kansas Coalition, declared, "It is a great day for Kansas."

"This is one of the arguments that we've been making all year in the Legislature, that the marriage amendment didn't reach this far," he said in an interview.

Morrison's analysis touched on statements from marriage amendment supporters before it went on the ballot that it was intended to protect the traditional definition of marriage.

Morrison, a Democrat, also quoted a legal analysis offered by Kris Kobach, a law professor at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Kobach, now the state Republican Party's chairman, said before the amendment went on the ballot that it wouldn't affect private contracts, wills, or any right not granted automatically upon marriage. Also, Witt was quick to note it wouldn't prevent local or state government agencies from extending benefits to gay employees' partners.

The marriage amendment's scope is an issue because Rep. Lance Kinzer, R-Olathe, questioned whether the Lawrence ordinance would violate it. He is sponsoring the bill to ban domestic partnership registries, which has been endorsed by a House committee but hasn't been debated by the chamber.

Kinzer said he wasn't surprised by Morrison's opinion because it always was "a bit a toss-up" whether the Lawrence ordinance would violate the constitution. He said the ordinance is "schizophrenic" in setting up a registry while declaring that doing so wouldn't grant any new rights to partners.

Morrison wrote in his opinion: "Should the Legislature wish to preclude cities from establishing such registries, it can do so by enacting uniform legislation that is pre-emptive in Kinzer said banning such registries would keep state laws on domestic relations consistent across Kansas. Allowing Lawrence's to stand would encourage expansion or ordinances in other cities, he said.

Also, Kinzer said, it makes no sense for government to legally sanction "two 18-year-olds who want to move in together" but not brothers and sisters who live together for decades.

Kinzer's assessment of the ordinance as political angered Witt, who said it's designed to help gay, lesbian and other unmarried Kansans get health insurance benefits for their part-

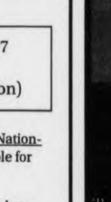

"The only person trying to score political points off the lives of gay and lesbian Kansans is Lance Kinzer," he said. "We're doing it protect our families."

HIGH-DOLLAR DECISIONS

Students have many choices when purchasing laptop computers

By Austin Apple

Many students will receive laptops this semester as graduation gifts, but selecting the right computer can be difficult

When students begin looking for laptops, their selections depend mostly on what they will do with their computers, said Derek Stafford, sales associate at Best Buy.

Everybody is different." Stafford said. Everybody has their own things that they

For example, students going into business might choose a Dell or IBM computer, said John Wallisch, senior in psychology.

"It depends on the person," he said. "I would guess that most students are going to get a PC:

Rebecca Gould, Information Technology Assistance Center director, said most of the computers ITAC saw during fall 2006 were Hewlett-Packards or Dells, with an increase in the number of Apple computers.

'We are seeing very few desktops and more laptops," Gould said.

Students agreed they preferred more mobile technology.

'We have seen more Dells. HPs and Toshibas," said Steve Madewell, senior in management information systems.

Madewell said he thought Toshiba computers were especially popular among international students.

ACCESSORIES

There are many different types of accessories students can choose from, said Frank Beer, owner of Manhattan's Radio Shack.

'Many laptops have a wireless network interface included," he said. "If you get a laptop without wireless capabilities, you can get a thumbdrive-sized wireless card, or you, said. can use the PCMCIA (Personal Computer Memory Card International Association)

Other faster network interfaces that are not standard on laptops also are available.

These faster interfaces are good when you know that you will be farther from the router," he said.

Other accessories students can buy are external mice, hubs that allow more USB ports and larger monitors that can be attached to smaller, less expensive laptops.

Another accessory students sometimes purchase are carrying cases for their lap-

"The majority of the laptop cases that we carry are Targus," said Brianna Buchanan, sales associate for Staples.

Staples also carries cases from Avenue,

Swiss Gear, Belkin and Wilson, she said.

"The Targus Rolling 17-inch Travel Case is one of the more detailed cases that we have," Buchanan said. "It fits up to a 17-inch laptop, has a retractable lock, a removable sleeve, a padded shoulder strap and a rear compartment.

A significant factor in deciding what laptop a student is going to buy is the cost. Beer

"Sometimes cost causes students to underbuy," he said.

Students should know what they need before they buy. Beer said.

"Engineering students might need more processing power and memory, while an elementary education student might not need that," he said.

Many company's offer student discounts on laptops to help students get what they need. According to Delluniversity.com, a student can get up to a 12-percent discount on the system of their choice

According to Apple.com, the student discount depends on what products students buy. A student could buy a MacBook Pro for $200 less than advertised with the student discount and could pay $100 less for a

Double feature a fun re-creation of grindhouse films

"Grindhouse" ****

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

The experience of sitting in a sweaty, dirty theater watching gratuitously violent, sexually explicit films with low-production values and even lower moral values isn't necessarily something I've dreamed

The films I've seen from this '70s era have been mostly on "Mystery Science Theater 3000," and as much as I hate Carmike Cinemas sometimes, I've never felt the need to get a tetanus shot after watching a movie.

That said, when Robert Rodriguez and Quentin Tarantino announced their creation of a double feature paying homage to these dirty films from the dark corners of cinematic history, I was pretty excited.

The three-and-a-half-hour runtime includes two full-length movies and four fake trailers previewing coming attractions.

The first film, Robert Rodriguez's "Planet Terror," tells the tale of a stripper, a tow-truck driver and a collection of other shady characters battling hordes of zombies.

Any time a film mixes zombies and strippers, you know you're in for a treat, but when the zombies eat the stripper's leg and she replaces it with a rocket launcher, that's when it becomes obvious Rodriguez has created a masterpiece.

"Planet Terror" is fast-paced, unapologetically violent and hopelessly cheesy. It's the perfect sendup of gross-out horror films and a great way to kick off the double

1881: Billy the Kid convicted of murder

After a one-day trial, Billy the Kid was found guilty of murdering the Lincoln County, N.M., sheriff and was sentenced to hang. After three years on the run and several other murders, Pat Garrett finally arrested Billy in early 1881. Garrett, a one-time friend, was the new sheriff of Lincoln County. On this day in 1881, a court took only one day to convict Billy of the murder of Sheriff Brady. Sentenced to hang, Billy was imprisoned in Lincoln's county jail.

On April 28, while Garrett was out of town, Billy managed to escape. He was not able to ride far enough. Upon his return to Lincoln, Garrett immediately formed a posse and set off to recapture the outlaw. On July 14, 1881, Garrett surprised Billy in a darkened room not far from Lincoln and shot him dead.

TUESDAY 1975: Josephine Baker dies

Black dancer Josephine Baker died on this day in 1975. Baker, born in 1906 in St. Louis, was stranded in Paris in 1925 when a show in which she was performing went bankrupt. She landed a dancing job in the Folies Bergere, where her dancing and skimpy costumes became an instant hit with Parisian audiences. In France, Baker was considered the epitome of the jazz era, and French fans continued to adore her for 50 years.

Apollo 13 carried astronauts Jim Lovell, Jack Swigert and Fred Haise. After an oxygen tank exploded on April 13, however, the new mission became to get the crew home. Lovell reported to mission control: "Houston, we've had a problem here." After four minutes of radio silence they splashed down safely into the Pacific Ocean.

Kansas begins program to better dispose of electronic waste

By Brie Handgraaf KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a quick turnover on modern technology, landfill operators find it difficult to properly process electronic

"There are many materials in electronic goods that are hazardous, such as lead and mercury," said Rebecca Clark, senior in biology.

Clark is president of Students for Environmental Action at K-State.

"Keeping these hazardous substances out of our landfills is good for both the environment and for human health,"

As part of a new program, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment will use grant money to set up e-waste collection centers across the state

"Overall, KDHE and other elected state officials want to promote the recycling of ewaste rather than dispose of it in landfills," said Bill Bider, director of the KDHE's Bureau of Waste Management.

"KDHE hopes that the state-sponsored collection centers will complement and further stimulate the growing private sector that processes e-waste into marketable ma-

"E-waste management is important to maintain the environment and public health," said Rebecca Roth, senior in anthropology. "I hope that appropriate recycling measures are taken so the chemicals don't make it into the water supply."

Through the new e-waste program, recycling centers must obtain permits to process electronic waste.

"The requirement to obtain solid-waste-processing facility permits will lessen impacts as well by ensuring that workers safely handle e-waste and prevent releases of hazardous constituents to Bider said convenient recycling centers would decrease the chances of improper dumping and lessen the risks for environmental contamination.

"By safely recycling e-

AfterHours supplied all the food, said Lorenzo Matthews, a graduate student adviser for UPC.

They also supplied the materials for attendees to build teddy bears for a charity in Manhattan.

slot machines passed the House and Senate but has yet to receive Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' signature, according to a report in the Topeka-Capital Journal on Thursday.

The bill has a fund reserved for state infrastructure needs, and funds would have to be appropriated to the account on an annual basis, Peterson said.

Regents president Reginald Robinson issued a statement about gambling in a press release on March 29.

"The Board of Regents understands that the issue of gaming is a difficult one for state policy makers," Robinson said in the release. "We certainly appreciate the perspectives of all of the members of both the House and the Senate who were called upon to vote on the recently adopted proposal.

"In today's complex budget environment, with a multitude of competing demands for a limited amount of state dollars, securing new sources of revenue is so vital for the future viability of the state's higher education system.

Sebelius announced her multi-year proposal on Jan. 31 to address the deferred maintenance backlog at Regents universities. Peterson said legislation was introduced and a hearing took place on the proposal in the Senate Ways and Means Committee. The legislation is now sitting in committee, Tax increases, casino gambling, turnpike-toll increases and student fees were among the possible solutions that the Senate Education Committee proposed in February, according to a Feb. 20 Lawrence-Journal World report.

The committee proposed two significant options to generate about $100 million a year for deferred maintenance backlog. One proposal called for a single source of ongoing revenue, like gaming. According to the report, the other option includes a property tax increase of $1 million, a $5 to $15 per-credit-hour maintenance fee on students, a one-tenth of a cent increase in the sales tax in counties that have public universities, and a 10 percent surcharge on ticket sales for university sales.

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said he remains hopeful that legislators will address the issue in late April.

"I think one thing that has happened is that we've familiarized everyone with the scope and magnitude of the problem," Rawson said. "People understand now that there is a problem, and they're starting to develop solutions for it."

BOARD OF REGENTS

On March 22, the Regents released a report, "Economic Impact of Deferred Maintenance Spending at Kansas Board of Regents Universities." The Docking Institute of Public Affairs produced the report, which analyzed the economic effect of spending associated with deferred-maintenance projects at the six Regents universities.

According to a Regents press release, the reports said if the entire $727 million deferred maintenance backlog was addressed, the associated statewide economic effect would be: ■ $1.63 billion increase in the economic output of goods and services:

■ $468.5 million increase in earnings in the state; and

■ 13,964 new jobs created in Kansas

STUDENTS

Daryn Soldan, SGA Governmental Relations Committee member, said he and several GR committee members visited the Capitol during early March and talked with local legislators and K-State alumni about deferred maintenance.

"We tried to get local representatives, both Republican and Democratic," said Soldan, graduate student in landscape architecture. "I think they understand local contingency has a good grasp on the issue, and it affects their district closely, so they tend to be pretty receptive to what we have to say."

Soldan, who was reelected as a senator for the 2007-08 SGA term, said he would like foundation that has been established," Weiser said in a statement. "One of the important factors in our decision to promote Frank was a desire to maintain the continuity of the current program and provide a stable environment for our student athletes."

Martin, 41, never has been a college head coach, but he spent time as a head coach at the high-school level in Florida. He guided Miami Senior High School to three consecutive state championships from 1996 to 1998 and posted a 102-10 record. He was an assistant at Northeastern University and at Cincinnati before joining K-State in 2006.

Martin will inherit a team that has one of the nation's top recruiting classes for 2007 and a talented roster.

Rex Morgan, a coach at Arlington Country Day School in Jacksonville, Fla., who has known Martin for years, said K-State made the right choice.

"I think it's a great hire," Morgan said. "With what they've built there in just a short year, I think Frank will keep the continuity going, and I think he'll be an outstanding Division I coach."

Though Martin is known for being a great recruiter, Morgan said he actually believes he's a better coach.

"He stresses defense," Morgan said. "The teams he's always coached have been very physical, and he holds everybody accountable. I think he's going to be an outstanding coach."

Weiser also announced Friday that Dalonte Hill was promoted to associate head coach. Hill is largely responsible for getting Michael Beasley, considered the No. 1 recruit by Rivals.com, to sign with K-State. Beasley's mother, Fatima Smith, told The Kansas City Star on Saturday that her son would honor his commitment to K-State and indicated Hill was one of the main reasons why.

Sherow keeps commission seat after provisional vote count

By Logan C. Adams KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When democracy doesn't work, fuck takes over.

A tie for a two-year seat on the city commission was the result this morning when provisional ballots were added to the totals from last week's election, said Deputy County Clerk Jolene Campbell. Jayme Morris-Hardeman received four votes, which brought her to 2,545 votes and tied her with Jim Sherow.

County Commissioner Al Johnson flipped a coin to determine the

"It was double-checked to make sure it wasn't a two-headed coin," Campbell said.

Sherow said Morris-Hardeman should make the call as she was the incumbent, she said. Morris-Hardeman called "heads," and the coin was flipped. The "tails" side came out on top, and Sherow was named the winner. Johnson said he kept the coin, a 2005 quarter with a dedication to the state of Oregon on the back.

There were 89 provisional ballots filled out county wide in last week's election, with 69 of them turning out to be valid and three of them partial, Campbell said. The remaining 17 were ruled invalid and not counted.

A ballot is considered provisional when the validity of a voter's registration is questionable and must be checked before the vote is tallied, Campbell said.

She said ballots are considered partial when people vote in the wrong area and only some of the offices for which they voted can be Sherow said it was a bizarre ending to the campaign. He said it was strange that a tie could happen in the election with more than 6,000 voters getting three votes each.

"For me, it was a matter of fate which way it went." Sherow said.

Morris-Hardeman could not be reached to comment for this story.

Police arrest man following series of auto thefts

By Leann Sulzen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Leonardville, Kan., man was arrested early Saturday morning after a failed attempt to leave the state, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup with the Riley County Police Department.

Thomas Booth, 19, was wanted in connection with two vehicle thefts, an attempted vehicle theft and theft from a residence.

The string of events began Friday when Karina Castro, 32, 2500 Farm Bureau Road, Lot 200, reported her 1990 Jeep Cherokee was stolen from her residence between 11:30 p.m. Thursday and 7 a.m. Friday.

out of gas at the intersection of Alert and Homestead roads in Leonardville, which is about 25 miles northwest of Manhattan, Moldrup said.

In a related incident, RCPD responded to a residential burglary Saturday in Leonardville. An officer was responding to the call when the victim was found on the side of the road next to his vehicle and a crashed car, Moldrup said.

The victim, Daniel Higgins, 54, said he was on his way home when he saw Booth broken down in a 1989 Red Toyota Corolla. Higgins knew Booth and stopped to help him. When Higgins returned to his home, he saw it had been burglarized, Moldrup said.

Higgins suspected Booth had chased after him. Booth crashed into a fence and fled. The car Booth was driving was stolen and belonged to Matthew Thurlow, also of Leonardville, Moldrup said.

Later that day, RCPD received a report that Booth attempted to steal another vehicle - a blue 2002 Peterbilt semi truck. Booth was not able to steal the vehicle, possibly because he could not operate it, Moldrup said.

Booth later made contact with citizens in the area who notified Kansas Highway Patrol of his location. KHP arrested Booth in the 8300 block of Walnut Creek Road in Leonardville, Moldrup said.

Bond was set at $50,000.

International Cultural Exhibition features 10 countries

Students, Manhattan residents present foreign music, dance

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ribbon dancers, piano players and the tantalizing smell of ethnic food were part of Monday's International Cultural Exhibition in the K-State Student Union Courtyard, part of the International Week Celebration.

The exhibition was the first event of a week-long celebration of different cultures represented at K-State.

International students represented 10 countries with a circle of booths displaying posters, authentic artifacts, sculptures, clothing items, books, dolls, food, currency and more.

Jimmy Wu, International Coordinating Council coordinator, said the purpose of the exhibition – which is in its seventh year – was to increase understanding and education of diversity on campus.

"We are here on campus to promote diversity in international students and American students," said Wu. "We try to include everyone in the community. It's not limited to students."

Many exhibition participants, such as Ganesh Nagisetti, were eager to share information about their country.

Nagisetti, who represented India, spoke about the country's infrastructure, superstition and religion while sharing facts, statistics and philosophy about his country.

Mario Vilmatoro, graduate student in economics from Costa Rica, also spoke fondly of his country and its nonexistent army.

"We are very proud of our peace," he said.

American and international students alike watched the festivities with smiles on their faces. They lined the perimeter, stairs and balcony of the Union Courtyard while participants shared stories about their cultures.

Crowds of students also gathered between classes to watch the flashing colors and pulsating rhythms of an international dance performance.

The short, interactive show featured music and dance from Japan, the Philippines, China and Paraguay. A sixth-grade class from Lee Elementary School also attended the event and had an opportunity to participate in a few dances.

Wu said the performance was a warm-up for the Festival of Talents, which will be Sunday night in McCain Auditorium.

"I think the exhibition was a really huge success this year," Wu said. "We had a wonderful performance, and it was a lot of fun." Wu said what he loves most about organizing the exhibition and participating in international week is working with people from all over the world.

"I think it's really rewarding, because you learn a lot from it," he said.

Attendees had a chance to vote for the best exhibition booth. Wu said 30 percent of the vote comes from students, and 70 percent comes from a panel of judges from international departments. First, second and third place winners will receive $50, $30 and $20, respectively, and will be announced April 15 during the talent show, Wu said.

The countries represented included Paraguay, Japan, India, Nepal, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Saudi Arabia, Taiwan, Costa Rica and many African countries.

Sigma Pi fraternity to receive charter in May with 60 members

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will have a new fraternity May 5 that will be one of the fastest fraternities ever to charter on campus.

Sigma Pi will become the first group to charter at K-State since Delta Lambda Phi chartered last year with fewer than 15 members. When they charter, Sigma Pi hopes to have more than 60 members.

Sigma Pi president Martin Wilson said he was excited about the number of members the fraternity has.

"This hasn't happened in a really long time at K-State," said Wilson, sophomore in biology. "There's a really good chance that it won't happen for another very long time at K-State."

It is good for K-State and for Greek Affairs, said Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs.

"It's a very exciting time for us to be adding a new fraternity into our greek community," he said. "It's a great opportunity for the entire campus."

EDRMING A COLONY

Sigma Pi colonized as a fraternity on Sept. 1, 2006, with 24 members, Wilson said.

To become a colony at K-State, members from the national Sigma Pi approached the K-State greek system and administrators. They deliberated and the Interfraternity Council voted to approve it, Wilson said.

The fraternity was in the process of gathering potential founding fathers of K-State's chapter for two weeks before being recognized as a colony Sept. 1.

Because they are not yet a chartered fraternity, Wilson said the members have as many rights as an initiated member at K-State, but they are in a limbo between a pledge and a fully initiated member internationally.

"I know some of the inner workings of our fraternity, but I don't know all of the secrets and the handshakes," he said.

During their colony period, they have recruited almost 60 members.

"We've used the database that they have on greek affairs," said Jason Swartz, recruiting chair. "Also, guys in the house have referred guys to me. That's how we got a lot of the guys."

EARNING A CHARTER

The next step in becoming a fraternity at K-State is to charter.

"As from day one, it was like, 'oh, my God, how are we going to do this?" Wilson said. "But it's one of those things that over time you get a membership made, and it's a lot easier to do."

In the chartering process, the fraternity has participated in homecoming, worked with other group's philanthropies, and worked with K-State PROUD. They also have worked with the Interfraternity Council president, Wilson said.

To get its charter, the members will write a 250-page petition to the national Sigma Pi headquarters as well as K-State's greek affairs. The petition will include the history of what happened through the year, the constitution and bylaws of K-State's Sigma Pi and risk-management policies.

"All of these things that other groups have had for 50 or 60 years, we've had to write in a matter of weeks," Wilson said. "It's been a crazy amount of work."

The fraternity is set to charter May 5 with a banquet at the Clarion Regency Ballroom.

"I think it's going to be great," said Jason Ohr, vice president of Sigma Pi. "A lot of us have put a lot of work into it. We haven't slept for a lot of it. I think that it's going to be a great experience for a lot of the guys, dates and guests."

Jones said it is amazing how fast the fraternity will earn its charter.

"They have moved through the process more quickly than an average chapter would," Jones said. "Part of it is the strong support from headquarters and strong commitment from local student leadership."

FOUNDING THE FRAT

The people who become members of Sigma Pi will be founding fathers of K-State's chapter. Wilson said it is one of the coolest things about being in Sigma Pi.

"A founding father is somebody who is remembered through a fraternity for as long as it exists, forever and ever," he said.

Each member will have their name on the paper that says they are chartered, and they will be known by all of the members of the fraternity as long as it exists.

"Literally, as a founding father, you're a legend in that fraternity," Martin said. "The founding fathers will forever be legends."

The group still is recruiting, and people can sign up until they charter to be founding fathers. But members of the fraternity said it would be best if they joined by April 15.

"We're still looking for a few guys to join before that time period," Swartz said. "Once we charter we'll keep going toward our pledge class in the fall."

Martin said the more members they have before chartering, the better, because it will make their chapter house cheaper to live in next year.

Jones said the number of members they have recruited so far is impressive.

"I think it's a testament to their hard work that they've been able to sign as many members as they had," he said. "It's a reflection of them delivering on the promise they made 'unique groundfloor leadership experience."

HAVING A VOICE

In most fraternities, the pledges do not have much of a say in what goes on at the meetings. But in Sigma Pi, since it is a colony, people can make a difference a few days after they say they are interested.

New members will be able to sit through the chapter meetings, Wilson said.

"They won't see the ritual, but they won't be completely kicked out of the house like other groups do," he said.

"Literally, within a week of meeting somebody, as a brother in the house, he could have an influence on our house," Wilson said. "Not just what kind of date party we're going to have but making a constitution of bylaws, our house rules and our judicial program."

These decisions will be the foundation of the fraternity, Wilson said.

PLANNING EVENTS

While they are just a colony, the members of Sigma Pi have a philanthropy event planned with the Women's Health Center for April 9-13.

Sigma Pi will sell T-shirts all week, which will be a ticket to get into a concert Friday night at City Park. Wilson said Wednesday, Thursday and Friday will be the main nights for their philanthropy event.

On Wednesday, a speaker from the Sam Spady foundation will make a presentation on alcohol consumption.

One night, the foundation's namesake became too drunk and her friends took her to the Sigma Pi chapter house at Colorado State to be cared for. She died in the house.

"Our Sigma Pi chapter there wasn't blamed, Wilson said. "In fact, they were commended for all the hard work they did to try to save her, but she passed."

While that chapter disbanded, some officers from the fraternity decided to set up the foundation to remember Spady and commemorate the chapter. The foundation raises money to promote awareness of the dangers of alcohol.

Spady's mother will speak Wednesday, and a presentation by the Ali Kemp Educational Foundation will follow.

A presentation called "The Art of Rape" will be Thursday night, and Friday night the concert will take place in City Park, and will feature the band The Ruckus. The group wants to have 15 bands at the concert, Wilson said.

College students should dedicate 2 hours each day as personal time

Throughout childhood and early adolescence, we always could depend on one part of the day, no matter how bad or well it went. After the bell rang at 3 p.m., we would rush to our homes, and one of three scenarios would unfold. We would plop down on the couch, flip on the television and watch cheesy TV shows like "Full House." Or instead of watching TV, we would attempt our homework - which, in total, consisted of about five math problems - and after 10 minutes, we'd give up and take a nap. The third possible scenario included gathering up our five best friends and participating in some kind of physical activity.

Day in and day out, for roughly three hours in the early evening, we would do one or all of these three situations. The situations became routine and comfortable, without our realization.

Then, suddenly, it stopped. For some, it ended in high school when competitive sports and academic clubs began. For others, it has yet to end. (I applaud these people.)

I did not realize how much I took this after-school routine for granted until I came to college and became insanely busy. It is something so simple and ingenious that it warrants a permanent place in our daily lives - for the rest of our

Setting a timer for 120 minutes each day for "you time" is not selfish or unreasonable; it is practical and efficient. Based on personal experience, after working or schooling for eight straight hours, the human body needs several hours to reboot and rejuvenate itself.

On most afternoons, I take a deep breath at 4 p.m., and stand up. I walk away from whatever I am doing, and I put it "on hold" for two hours. I take a nap, watch a couple of episodes of "Friends" or simply sit. Obviously, when I graduate and get a job in the "real world," this habit of walking away for several hours will become more difficult to continue. However, it still is a reasonable daily goal.

A personal mini-vacation every afternoon allows the mind to escape the day's work and stress. About 3 or 4 p.m. is an ideal time, because it allows for a two-hour break, yet there is enough time left in the day afterward to accomplish some tasks, like cooking, cleaning and studying.

This is the time of the academic year when several hours of recess are especially necessary and acceptable. Finals are about a month away. Projects and papers are due in several classes, on the same day. Now, more than ever, it is OK to stop and watch television or play basketball in the afternoon.

I realize it is not always possible to take a two-hour break, but there are other small ways to escape Take a 15-minute walk around the block or the office. Get an icecream cone with a close friend. I am convinced that ice cream solves any problem. Try incorporating it into the two-hour break at least once a week.

For two hours a day, try growing "down" instead of growing "up." Return to the fountain of youth and

KING

The continued screaming of "uncle" by the West against the grips of Islamofascism has started to choke out the onceproud Western culture.

Events have transpired which force many Americans to look to the past and recognize that history is repeating itself.

A year later, Britain was at war with one of the most evil empires in our history.

Before the British sailors were released from Iran, Tony Blair became a sniffling child hiding in a corner, allowing his country once again to be manipulated by thugs.

In response to the Iranians holding British sailors captive, Blair said, "We bear you no ill will. On the contrary, we respect Iran as an ancient civilization - a nation with proud and dignified history."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came out smelling of roses after his utter disrespect for the British government.

Our good liberal friends were happy to exalt him for the kindness he displayed while parading around his captives.

Though the British sailors were returned, the political damage has forced the British government to walk with its tail between its legs. However, other groups are being pushed around as well.

The Human Rights Council of the United Nations passed a resolution creating a "global prohibition on the public defamation of religion."

Language presented in the bill only discusses the defamation of Islam. Don't worry - Christianand Jew-hating is still fair game.

The President of Iran has said publicly multiple times that Iran will drive Israel into the sea. Yet the United Nations allows this rhetoric to continue.

Our well intentioned liberals believe dialogue and collectivism will bring peace to our world, believing conflict stems from not understanding one another. Instead of advancing or holding ground, they insist we take a step back, take a few breaths then discuss a solution.

Even with compromise, there are still winners and losers.

With every step back from a problem, we are putting ourselves further against the wall.

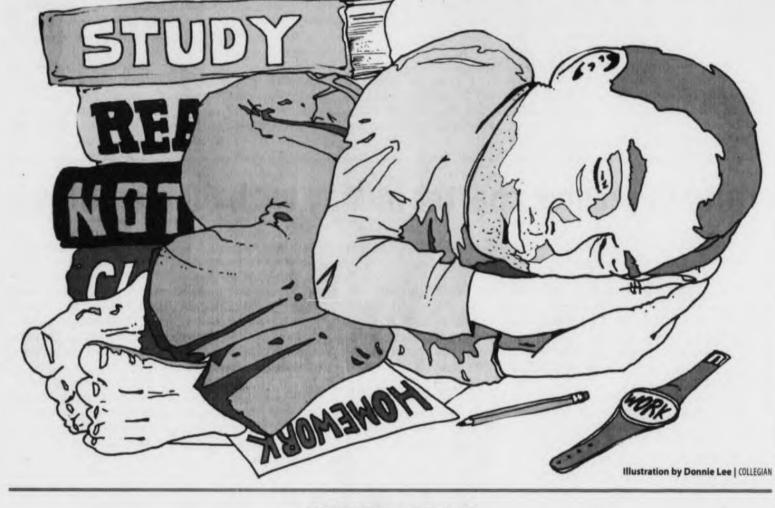

Western countries still have their best days ahead.

These nations were formed by individuals who went against the grain and stood up for what all that they knew in their hearts to be

While the mentality of the appeaser always has been present in Western history, it was the actions of those men who knew what was right and knew their struggle was going to be difficult that shaped these countries.

City of Manhattan should find better method than tossing coins for handling voting ties

A coin toss. The fate of who would obtain a seat on the Manhattan City Commission was decided by a quarter.

After a close race in the commission election, Jim Sherow and incumbent Jayme Morris-Hardeman tied in the number of votes they received to obtain the final seat of a group of officials, making vital decisions as to the future of the

One would think two candidates receiving the same number of votes for such a prestigious position would be given another opportunity to restate their views, debate the issues or give one last plea to the public to vote. But the decision was made by Morris-Hardeman's call of "heads" and the coin coming up "tails."

What if all significant decisions were made by the flip of a coin?

Imagine the president tossing a coin over which national policy to veto or which department should receive financial aid. Democracy is about the representation of the people based on who they think is most qualified and will do the best job - not by who "calls" it better.

As an editorial board, we are not making an endorsement for Sherow or Morris-Hardeman.

Instead, we exhort city officials to consider the public and the fairness of placing one person into office by "luck."

The people have no more say in the issue. They sit back and hold their collective breath, praying the infernal coin will fall to their liking.

A debate, a re-vote - an arm-wrestling match, for that matter - something has to be more appropriate than a coin toss.

In the issue, one fact is certain - Morris-Hardeman likely will be calling "tails" from now on.

RUN-OFF VOTE LIKELY IN EAST TIMOR ELECTION, RAISES FEARS OF DISORDER

DILI, East Timor - East Timor's presidential elections appeared to be headed toward a runoff Monday, raising fears of prolonged instability in a young nation that nearly descended into civil war a year ago.

Prime Minister Jose Ramos-Horta, who won the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize for championing East Timor's struggle to end decades of brutal Indonesian rule, initially had been seen as the favorite for the five-year presidency.

But public disillusionment with the government has grown, and no clear winner between eight candidates emerged in early ballot counting. An outright majority was needed to avoid a runoff, which would be held next month.

East Timor was heralded as a success in nation-building when it formally declared independence in 2002 but descended into chaos last year after then-Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri fired a third of the tiny army, provoking gunbattles between rival security forces that spiraled into gang warfare and ATHENS. Greece - Greek rescuers will deploy a robot submarine to search for the bodies of two French tourists believed to have drowned when a cruise ship sank off a resort island in the Aegean Sea last week, authorities said Monday.

The ship's captain has blamed Thursday's accident on sea currents that swept the Sea Diamond onto a charted reef off the island of Santorini, tearing a hole in the ship's hull. Nearly 1,600 people - mostly American tourists - were rescued before the 469-foot vessel sank.

More than 50 tons of the ship's fuel leaked after the sinking, some of which has washed ashore, Santorini Mayor Angelos Roussos told The Associated Press, although he added "the cleanup company has the situation under control."

BRITAIN'S GOVERNMENT BACKTRACKS ON LETTING SAILORS TALK FOR PAY

LONDON - Name. Rank. Serial number. Price.

It was the British Ministry of Defense's new policy for allowing marines and sailors freed by Iran last week to sell their stories about their captivity to the media. But the change in long-standing rules against paid interviews lasted barely a day.

The government beat a hasty retreat Monday under withering criticism that the fees, reportedly as high as six figures, were unseemly and a slap at families of military personnel killed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The appearance of the first paid interviews also brought new criticism that the 15 crew members yielded too easily to Iranian pressure to make confessions and apologies. Some worried the crew's actions revealed a loss of Britain's famed "stiff upper lip" in tough times.

MASSES OF SHIITES MARCH, DEMAND U.S. DEPARTURE TO MARK BAGHDAD'S FALL

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Tens of thousands of Shiites - a sea of women in black abayas and men waving Iraqi flags - rallied Monday to demand that U.S. forces leave their country. Some ripped apart American flags and tromped across a Stars and Stripes rug.

The protesters marched about three miles between the holy cities of Kufa and Najaf to mark the fourth anniversary of the fall of Baghdad. In the capital, streets were silent and empty under a hastily imposed 24-hour driving ban.

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr ordered the march as a show of strength to Washington and to Iraq's establishment Shiite ayatollahs as well.

Al-Sadr, who disappointed followers hoping he might appear after months in seclusion, has pounded his anti-American theme in a series of written statements. The most recent came on Sunday as he called on his Mahdi Army militia to redouble efforts to expel American forces and for the police and army to join in on the struggle.

NORTH KOREA TELLS U.S. IT WILL OK INSPECTIONS WHEN FUNDS RELEASED

YONGYANG, North Korea A U.S. delegation pressed North Korea on Monday to shut down its main nuclear reactor and allow in U.N. inspectors even as the top American negotiator said it would be difficult for a weekend deadline on the closure to be met.

The American delegation said North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye Gwan, told them his government would allow U.N. nuclear inspectors into the country as soon as $25 million in disputed North Korean funds are released.

Anthony Principi, President Bush's former veteran affairs secretary, said Kim told the Americans it would be difficult to shut down the nuclear reactor by a Saturday deadline called for in a Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament accord. Under that agreement, the North must shut down and seal the Yongbyon nuclear reactor and a reprocessing facility in exchange for an initial shipment of aid.

Huggins eats words from 1st press conference

Editor,

Bob Huggins once commented, "Why settle for second when first is available?" This statement was made at the first press conference when Huggins accepted the job at K-State.

A person's word is funny nowadays. It seems to me that by leaving a town loyal to K-State and its teams out to dry is not only settling for less than first place, it's not something that any true winner would do.

Huggins said he came to K-State to turn the program around. But the "turning around" of K-State basketball was not something he was going to do for K-State. He came to build up his résumé and to dig himself out of the unemployment hole he got himself into.

He betrayed and misled the fans, the players and the entire community that welcomed him. His decision to leave with no closing statement was not only selfish but rude and disrespectful.

Without a doubt, I credit Bob Huggins for bringing life back into Bramlage Coliseum and creating a sense of hope in the K-State faithful. But with Huggins leaving abruptly, it now creates a covered hope in which we are once again doubtful of the outcome.

The K-State fans were behind him 110 percent. His legacy at West Virginia will not come close to that of what it could have been at K-State.

So enjoy your time at West Virginia, Huggins, for you have left the best fans that you could wish for as a head coach.

Annual Ag Fest begins today

By Christina Hansen KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four days of events promoting philanthropy, fun and education are planned for the College of Agriculture's annual Ag Fest, beginning today in Weber Arena.

This year's Ag Fest was designed to appeal to several groups, not just the agricultural community, said Allison Crook, public relations chair for the College of Agriculture Student Council and junior in agricultural communications and journalism.

"We want to keep current students involved and remind them that K-State is a prestigious college," she said.

"But the event is also directed to the public of Manhattan, especially kids. It is intended to get kids with no agricultural background involved in and learning about agriculture."

The Kiddie Barnyard, an annual Ag Fest children's event, will kick off this year's festival from 9 to 11 a.m. today in Weber Arena. The barnyard will include a petting zoo of common farm animals, as well as educational displays about Kansas crops and other native plants.

Ag Fest co-chair Mark

Maynard, senior in agricultural economics, said record attendance is expected for this year's Kiddie Barnyard "In the past event. few years, the festival has dwindled off in campus-wide interest," he said, "but this year, we have 470 students attending, which is twice as many as we've ever had."

The University of Nebraska's Ron Hanson also will present a lecture at 6 p.m. today in Forum Hall. The lecture, "Continuing the Kansas Legacy of Family Farming," will have a business as well as agricultural angle, Maynard said.

"Hanson's speech is about passing down the family farm through generations - that process and all of the snags you're going to hit along the way," Maynard said. "But it is presented more from the family business perspective, which makes his speech relevant to more people than just students in the college of ag."

Another popular Ag Fest event returning this year will be the Cowboy Olympics, scheduled for 8 p.m. Wednesday in Weber Arena.

Event coordinator Jessica Smith, junior in animal science and industry, said the olympics will feature fourperson student and faculty teams competing in a range of physically challenging events including roping, throwing seed sacks and wheelbarrow

Smith said competition this year would be tight, as 33 teams registered to compete in Wednesday night's event.

year's festival is the Ag for a Cure Concert scheduled for 8 p.m. Thursday evening. The concert will feature Jason Boland and the Stragglers and opening act Pete Gile, and all proceeds will be donated to the National Multiple Sclerosis Society.

Kelsey Frazier, junior in agricultural economics and public relations, said a great deal of planning, as well as a group of corporate sponsors, helped the festival organizers' concept of a benefit concert become a reality.

'We decided we wanted to do this benefit concert, because it has a purpose - it's not just another event," she said. "Our ag council has been very supportive, which is important because the concert has been a lot of work, and we had to take care of a lot of details. And our sponsors are important, because we want to give all the money from the concert to the MS Society."

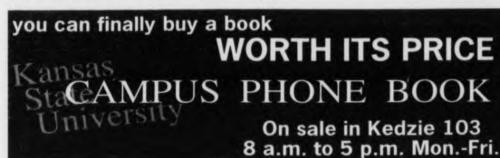

Tickets for the concert still are available and students can purchase them for $15 at the RB Outpost, Varney's K-State Place, the K-State Student Union and Varney's in Aggieville.

The final event of the 2007 Ag Fest will be a barbecue from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Friday on Weber Lawn. This free event is sponsored by FarmHouse, Alpha Gamma Rho and the Cargill Corporation and is open to the pub-

Crook said she hoped Ag Fest would introduce students from different cultural backgrounds and academic A new event added to this departments to the College of Agriculture.

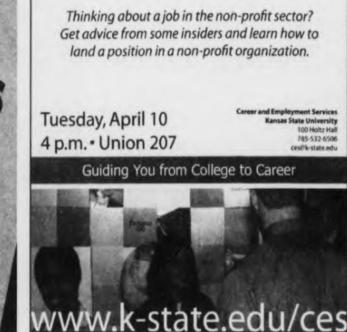

"The festival lets people know that ag students are not uninvolved in the K-State community," she said.

"Although it may seem like we just go to class all day and then go home and work, the College of Ag is very supportive of our university. And we are hoping to get a lot of other students involved, as well."

Frank Martin smiles during his introductory press conference as the K-State men's basketball coach Monday. Martin, 41, has worked as a bouncer, a bartender and a math teacher, but now he will try his luck at leading a major Division I basketball program.

Martin waits 22 years for head coaching opportunity

By Jeffrey Rake KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Frank Martin waited 22 years to become a head coach at a Division I university, but never did he experience anything like the last six days.

Blame his wife, Anya Martin, for

She moved with Martin from city to city for the past three years, and after former coach Bob Huggins left for West Virginia, she feared she might have to move once again.

That's when the possibility of Martin replacing Huggins started becoming a realistic scenario.

When this whole thing got going, I thought she was going into labor," Martin said jokingly of his wife, who is expecting a child later this month.

But now he officially has been named coach, Martin said he is thankful and excited about the opportunity he has. And how could he not be? He's had a job since he was 12 years old - everything from washing pots and pans at the neighborhood restaurant to bartending and being a bouncer - and now at age 41, he has been given the keys to a program in a major conference.

It's a great situation for a man who spent the majority of his childhood be leaning toward transferring. trying to help his mother raise a fam-

"I've been a fighter my whole life," Martin said. "I've followed a different path to get here."

With an incoming recruiting class that's ranked No. 1 by Rivals. com, which includes top recruit Michael Beasley, some have questioned whether Martin got the job because of the players coming in. Martin said he doesn't care if his critics feel that

"If people want to think my hiring is just because of Mike (Beasley) and Bill (Walker), just because of that, they've got the right to think what they choose to," Martin said. "It's my duty to make them better men."

BENNETT CONSIDERS STAYING

Rex Morgan, the former high school coach of Jason Bennett at Arlington Country Day School in Jacksonville, Fla., said by phone Saturday that Jason would spend some time in the coming weeks thinking about his future at K-State.

With Huggins leaving to take over as coach at West Virginia, Bennett, who has expressed homesickness throughout the year, was believed to

Not so fast, said teammate David Hoskins.

"Jason will be fine," Hoskins said. "I talked to Jason, and I think he'll be back. He's up in the air, but he probably doesn't know which way to be. He's just kind of out there."

Hoskins said other underclassmen have been mulling over their futures since Huggins left, but did not specify which players.

"A couple of them are still up in the air, and they have the right to be, because they're young and freshmen and don't really know what to do right now," Hoskins said. "As a captain, it's not my job to tell them what to do, but just tell them their options. I feel like their best option is to stay here and win some championships with us."

WALKER NOT BITTER

Freshman Bill Walker said he was upset at Huggins when he first heard the news that the coach was leaving after just one year.

'I was angry at the time, you know?" Walker said.

Since then, Walker said he apologized, but did acknowledge that he remains disappointed in Huggins' decision.

"I've known him for a long time," Walker said. "I committed to come out here and play for Bob Huggins, and that was always my dream."

Walker said K-State's decision to hire Martin was a big reason why he will remain in Manhattan, rather than pursuing other options.

"When they hired Frank, I was like, 'I'll be alright here," he said. "You don't want anybody new coming in here and breaking up something we Asked if he'd endorse a switch from "Huggieville" to something like "Martinville," Walker didn't hesitate.

"Nah, we should just leave that alone," he said. "Let Frank be his own man."

The K-State baseball team (22-10, 4-5 Big 12 Conference) is set to play Creighton (19-11, 6-3 Big 12) tonight at Tointon Family Stadium.

Both teams rely primarily on "small ball," as neither has a lot of batting power in their prospective lineups.

Neither team has a hitter with more than three home runs. Both K-State and Creighton only have six games in which they have scored more than 10 runs.

While K-State as a team has 11 home runs, Creighton has hit 12. The two teams also have identical on-base percentages of .382.

The key to this game could be which team reaches the seven-run mark first. Creighton has only one victory in which it gave up more than six runs

The Wildcats have only won two games in which they yielded more than six.

Creighton and K-State both are led offensively by sophomores.

K-State's Byron Wiley continues to lead the team hitting .394 with two home runs and 20 RBI. Darin Ruf is hitting .348 with three home runs and 25 RBI to lead the Jays.

The Wildcats have gone 5-5 in their last 10 games while Creighton has been playing better baseball of late, sporting a record of 7-3 over their last 10.

The schedule for K-State during the next few weeks is a difficult one that includes trips to Oklahoma State, Wichita State and Nebraska.

The final race Saturday proved to be a heartbreaker, when the Kansas first varsity eight slipped by K-State, winning by just two seconds. The race landed Kansas eight points, enough to secure its 12-10 victory. The Wildcats led for most of the race, but ran out of steam in the last and reaped the benefits of having a fast start."

"I am really upset that we got beat in the last five strokes," Sweeney said. "We need to find more fight and aggression. Up until the last 300 meters or so, it was a great race for us. #### BKC | Kansas' Wright declares for NBA draft after 2 seasons

LAWRENCE - Julian Wright, the versatile but inconsistent power forward who helped Kansas win two straight Big 12 titles, is skipping his last two years to go into the NBA

The 6-foot-8 Chicago native, who insisted all year long he would be back for his junior season, said at a news conference Monday that money was not the deciding issue.

"Money has never been my motivation," he said. "It's not my family's (motivation). Mostly, just playing and feeling like I'm able to advance my game to the next level. It's not about the money. I'm just happy and grateful to have the opportunity.

Often inconsistent but at times spectacular with his long wing span and rare athletic gifts, Wright averaged 12.7 points and 6.3 rebounds in helping the Jayhawks win their second straight Big 12 Tournament title. In the regular season, he averaged 12 points and 8.1

His best scoring game was a 33-point salvo at Missouri. But, showing his bad side one night at home, he went up for a spectacular, uncontested dunk but lost control of the ball and his body and landed in an embarrassed heap beneath the basket. Coach Bill Self was so disgusted, he jerked him out of the game.

"Julian is a versatile, fabulous athlete who can do a lot of things very, very well," said Self, who joined his star player at the news

"He'd be the first to agree that there are some things he needs to get better at. But I don't know how many 19-year-olds or 20-year-olds don't have to get better at something. He'll work hard to do that.

"But you can't teach a lot of things that Julian does very, very well. And you can't coach a lot of things he does very, very well. And I think that was intriguing for a lot of folks."

Wright, who lacks a 3-point shot, said he expects to go somewhere between No. 10 and No. 16 in the first round.

Common need

More than 3.4 million Americans —particularly women — suffer some form of iron deficiency

By Abby Brownback KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Meg Gentry can feel when her iron levels are low.

A cross country and longdistance track runner for K-State, Gentry becomes exhausted during training, in class and at home, and her race times get significantly slower.

Gentry, junior in secondary education, is one of the 3.4 million Americans with anemia

The National Anemia Action Council defines anemia as "a below-normal level of hemoglobin or hematocrit." Carried by red blood cells, hemoglobin transports oxygen to the body. Hematocrit is the "percentage of red blood cells in a blood sample."

Menstruating girls and women should have a hemoglobin level between 12.3 and 15.3 grams per deciliter. The healthy range for men is 14.0-17.4 g/dl. The World Health Organization says women whose levels fall below 12 g/ dl and men whose levels drop below 13 g/dl are anemic. Healthy hematocrit levels are at least 36 percent for women and 42 percent for men.

DIAGNOSIS

Anemia is diagnosed when a physician notes symptoms of weakness and fatigue in a patient and orders a complete blood count or a blood test of the patient's ferritin level, or the amount of iron stored in the patient's body, said Dr. James Gardner, an internal medicine doctor who has practiced in Manhattan for almost 30 years. Tests of a patient's iron level or iron-binding capacity might also be conducted, but are not as reliable.

If the test results indicate the patient is iron deficient, that should raise questions of losing blood, Gardner said. He then checks for blood loss through urine, stools and heavy periods. Probes for colon cancer or irregularities in the gastrointestinal tract come next.

Iron deficiency anemia like Gentry's is the most prevalent type of anemia, Gardner said, but cases are not typically severe. It occurs in 9 percent to 16 percent of menstruating girls and women and in 7 percent of 1- and 2-year-olds, according to the NAAC.

Iron deficiency anemia occurs when an individual's body lacks sufficient iron, caused by insufficient absorption of iron, a diet too low in iron, or an excessive loss of blood - often from heavy menstrual cycles, a severe injury, ulcers or problems in the gastrointestinal system or the colon, said Dr. Scott Coonrod, a Manhattan-based internal medicine doctor.

The body needs a certain amount of iron to function as part of the blood's hemoglobin, binding oxygen to the molecule and delivering it to the body for use in daily activities like metabolism.

"Hemoglobin binds to oxygen, and without it, we wouldn't be alive, because you couldn't transport as much oxygen around the body," Gardner said.

WOMEN AT RISK

Premenopausal women have a Recommended Dietary Allowance of 18 milligrams of iron daily, while men should consume 8 milligrams daily, according to the American Dietetic Association's "Complete Food and Nutrition Guide."

Women should consume more iron than men due to loss of blood through monthly menstruation, and those with heavy periods should take an iron supplement, Gardner

"(Anemia) is almost a normal thing for a woman with heavy menstrual periods," he

Pregnant women also require additional iron to account for the fetus' needs.

The ADA notes women are at greater risk for iron deficiency anemia, because they frequently abstain from foods rich in iron to control their weight. Dianna Schalles, a registered dietician at Lafene Health Center, said college students also are at risk for iron deficiency anemia because of their diets.

"College students, in particular females, often don't buy a lot of meat, which contributes a more absorbable form of iron," she said. "Sometimes this is due to the expense, vegetarian preferences or the perception that meat is too difficult to pre-

SYMPTOMS

When people do not get enough iron - and therefore enough oxygen - they might notice symptoms of fatigue, weakness, pale skin, dizziness, irritability, headache, poor concentration, a rapid heartbeat or shortness of breath, according to the the patient's heart to work harder, which can result in high output heart failure, Coonrod said.

WAYS TO COPE

Occasionally, physicians refer patients with iron deficiency anemia to Schalles for diet therapy, which includes education on what foods are high in absorbable iron. She said the treatment for iron deficiency anemia is fairly straightforward.

Some patients simply need to increase their consumption of foods rich in iron; patients with more severe cases might need to take either prescription or over-the-counter iron supplements - like ferrous sulfate - which begin rebuilding a patient's iron concentration in two to three weeks, Gardner said.

"When (iron stores) become depleted, prescription doses of iron are usually necessary to help replenish to normal levels," Schalles said.

Coonrod said he recommends anemic patients take 325-650 milligrams of overthe-counter iron supplements daily to buoy their iron lev-

Additional medication might be necessary for those whose iron deficiency anemia is caused by heavy menstrual periods: a birth control pill can help regulate monthly blood loss.

Gentry drinks a liquid iron supplement with orange juice twice a day. She said she began taking the supplements when she joined K-State's cross-country team almost three years ago.

"Pretty much all college

NAAC. Anemia also forces women long-distance runners are (iron) deficient, so when you join the team, the coach makes you get tested,"

> Gentry said she also made dietary changes to boost her iron intake. She now eats red meat and leafy greens whenever possible.

Food sources of iron come in two broad categories: heme and nonheme.

Heme sources of iron are animal-based, while nonheme sources are plant-based, Schalles said. Iron derived from heme sources is more readily absorbed, but iron absorption from nonheme sources can be increased by pairing them with acidic foods or foods with vitamin C. Absorption is inhibited, however, by coffee, tea and excess fiber.

Good sources of heme iron include beef liver, lean sirloin, lean ground beef and skinless dark chicken, all of which have more than 1 milligram of iron per 3 ounces, according to the ADA. Nonheme iron comes from fortified cereals, pumpkin seeds, spinach and red kidney beans, among other goods. Each of these has more than 2.5 milligrams of iron per serving.

Gardner said iron deficiency anemia generally does not have permanent health effects, which is good news for Gentry.

"Iron is your body's capacity to store oxygen, so for distance runners, it's the big thing," she said.

Anemia information

Anemia, a condition where there is a lower number of red blood cells in the blood than normal, usually is measured by a decrease in hemoglobin, the oxygen-carrying part of red blood cells, according to the MedlinePlus Web site, www. nlm.nih.gov. Several types of anemia exist.

Anemia, due to B12 deficiency: a drop in the number of red blood cells due to a lack of vitamin B12, essential for normal nervous system function and blood ■ Anemia, due to folate deficiency: decrease in red blood cells caused by a lack of folate, or folic acid, necessary for red blood cell formation and growth. Folate is found in green, leafy vegetables and liver.

■ Anemia, due to iron deficiency: when red blood cells are not providing adequate oxygen to body tissues. It is the most common form of anemia.

■ Hemolytic anemia: a condition where there are not enough red blood cells in the blood. This is caused by premature destruction of red blood cells. Often occurs when the bone marrow is unable to make up for premature destruction of red blood cells by increasing their production.

■ Glucose-6-phosphate dehydrogenase deficiency: G-6-PD deficiency is an inheritable, X-linked recessive disorder whose primary effect is the reduction of the enzyme G-6-PD in red blood cells.

■ Idiopathic aplastic anemia: failure of the bone marrow to properly make all types of blood cells, results from injury to the blood-stem cell, a cell that gives rise to other blood-cell types after it divides.

■ Megaloblastic anemia: a blood disorder when red blood cells are larger than normal. The condition usually results from a deficiency of folic acid or vitamin B12.

Professor researches Kansas aquifer, water shortages

By Bridgette A. West KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Water shortages in western Kansas are a reality, according to research conducted by a K-State political scientist.

Joe Aistrup, head of the Department of Political Science, has researched water use from the Ogallala Aquifer in western Kansas and policy options to resolve its issues about the depletion rate.

The Ogallala Aquifer is the main water resource in western Kansas, and relies on the water for production of grain and livestock

"In terms of its use, we have your traditional irrigation for corn, milo and alfalfa - basically for what we use to feed cattle," Aistrup said. "This is currently the most substantial use of the aquifer."

The aquifer covers portions of eight states, including Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming and South Dakota.

The aquifer is a storage reservoir for groundwater, a renewable resource that replenishes slowly.

When extraction of water does not match the regeneration of water, it is a problem, said Mansel Phillips of the Amarillo Globe News in his column, "Too many thirsty industries, not nearly enough

you can finally buy a book

Aistrup's work focuses on state policy. He hypothesized short-term aquifer use will have long-term effects on water levels and the Kansas economy, which relies on that water for production of feed grain and livestock.

Proposed ethanol plants in western Kansas would require more extraction from the aquifer, so regulations on the resource must increase, Aistrup said.

"Some economists argue that the job creation in the production of grain for ethanol, building of the plants, and the actual laborers in the plants are a greater benefit than the water itself," he said. "They neglect to acknowledge that the depletion of a natural resource is avoidable with simple regulation adjustments for extraction."

Annual recharge of the aquifer in Kansas ranges from about 4 inches near Hutchinson, Kan., to a low of less than .5 inches along the Kansas-Colorado border, said Chuck Martin, associate professor of geography.

The level of water saturation in the aquifer has depleted more than 40 feet since 1980, while areas in Nebraska have risen between 10 and 20 feet, according to "Conserving the Ogallala Aquifer: Efficiency, Equity, and Moral Motives" by Jeffrey M. Peterson, Thomas L. Marsh, and Jeffrey R. Williams.

"For the western third of the aquifer, annual recharge is typically one inch or less," Martin said. "This is far less than the rate at which water is being removed from the aquifer in that area for irriga-

"As a result, water tables in much of the western third of Kansas have dropped by 50 percent or more since 1950."

Kansas' economy and the United States rely on the aquifer. Kansas is one of the nation's largest beef-producing states and a producer of large amounts of grain used for feed in the livestock in-

Water use is controlled by allotting portions in shares. The shareholders can sell the shares if they see fit, allowing incoming ethanol plants to purchase them.

"Current regulation of the aquifer limits the amount of water that can be extracted by anyone, but priority is given to farmers and ranchers." Aistrup said. "With these ethanol plants being built, some water shares will be sold to the plants, giving farmers and ranchers less water to work with and taking those products and jobs from the Kansas economy "Is job production a greater benefit than that of a natural resource like the aquifer? I don't know."

City pools set to open May 27

By Eric Davis KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beginning May 27, Manhattan residents of all ages will have one more way to cool off during the summer heat with the opening of the city's public pools.

The city operates three pools, in Northview Park, CiCo Park and City Park. The pool in City Park is the closest to K-State's main campus

The City Park pool will be open from 1 to 6 p.m. on its first two days of operation then go to regular hours from May 29 to Aug. 11. The pool's regular hours will be from 1 to 8:45 p.m.

Children ages 12 and under can get into the pool for $1.50. Seniors ages 62 and above also are eligible to receive the discount. For children ages 13 to 18, the cost to swim is $2. Adults over age 19 must pay $2.50 for each visit to their favorite city pool.

Frequent visitors can buy a season pass, valid in all of the city's pools. Passes cost $25, $30 and $35, depending on age. A family pass can be purchased for $70.

For the pass to save the swimmer money, 12-and-under swimmers must visit the pool 17 times over the summer. Swimmers age 12 to 18 must swim 15 times before their pass saves them money and adults must swim 14 times to pass the break-even

"Each pass only gets one person into the pool," said Debbie Dugan, administrative supervisor for the City of Manhattan's parks and recreation department.

Dugan said the passes can be purchased at the Parks and Recreation department office in the northeast corner of City Park.

Students in the area said they already are excited about the opening of the pool season. Terra Sawdy, sophomore in elementary education, said she went swimming at City Park last year and is excited to return to the pool.

"My favorite part was the diving board," Sawdy said, "I also like how wide the pool

The large pool at City Park features three diving boards - two low dives and one high dive. A large slide spills its riders into the shallow end of the pool, giving the swimmer several ways to splash into the pool.

Lani Thomas, freshman in open option, said she also was excited about the different activates that the pool offers. She said she went to the pool last year.

"I am not sure if I will buy a pass but I will most likely go to the pool once or twice," Thomas said.

KANSAS CITY, - Having the television show "Extreme Makeover: Home Edition" build and furnish their new home made some aspects of life easier for the Jacobo family of Kansas City.

The Jacobos' property taxes will double, utility and insurance costs on the new home will increase - and they still owe $121,000 on the mortgage of the old home.

Those involved in helping to build the house have started a fund to help the Jacobos afford the house and furnishings, which viewers will see them receive when the episode airs

"We don't want to see the incredible blessings and outpouring provided in the short term become a financial burden for the family in the long run," said Rep. Jeff Grisamore, R-Lee's Summit.

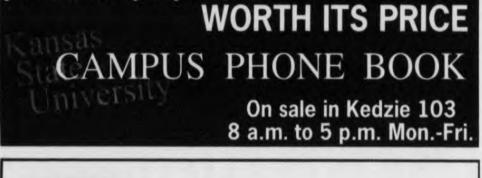

On March 18, the family was given a home five times the size of the 912-square-foot home in which they had lived.

Green said he had raised about $50,000 to help with expenses, about $71,000 short of what the family needs.

The Jacobos' increased home equity will help them manage finances, said Conrad Ricketts, executive producer of the show. Energy-efficient building materials and appliances are designed to keep utility bills affordable.

In the four years the show has built houses, no families have sold or lost their homes, he said. The recipients are counseled on finances, and a producer for the show keeps in touch with them.

A walk in the 'Park'

Comedy Central's Emmy-winning 'South Park' celebrates 10th anniversary

Fans of Comedy Central's Emmy Award-winning show "South Park" have much to celebrate this year. In addition to a new season of shows and the release of "South Park: The Complete Ninth Season" on DVD, television's crudest, most offensive - but also smartest and funniest - show turns 10 years old this year.

"South Park" debuted on Comedy Central on Aug. 13, 1997, and its creators, Trey Park-Mark Sibilla er and Matt Stone, immediately garnered attention for their crude humor and distinct animation style. The show follows four young boys - Stan Marsh, Kyle Broflovski, Eric Cartman and Kenny McCormick - as they experience a wide array of strange happenings and meet a variety of crazy characters in their small mountain town in Colorado.

On March 6, 2007, "South Park" enthusiasts were able to add one more season of the show to their burgeoning DVD collections. Season nine is notorious for two episodes: "Best Friends Forever" and "Trapped in the Closet."

In the former, an Emmy Award-winning episode, Kenny buys a Sony PSP and manages to beat the game "Heaven vs. Hell," but once he does, an ice cream truck immediately kills him. As it turns out, Kenny's death was no accident, as the game was a training simulation for the final battle between the armies of heaven and hell. Kenny is to lead the armies of heaven using a holy, golden PSP, when, in a scathing parody of the Terry Schiavo debacle, Kenny's soul becomes trapped in his body when doctors revive him after being legally dead for more than a day, leaving Kenny in a persistent vegetative state.

The remainder of the episode involves the forces of hell using Republicans in Washington, D.C., to ensure Kenny is kept alive with a feeding tube, so heaven can be defeated now that it no longer has its "Keanu Reeves character" (a satire of the movies "Constantine" and "The Matrix"). The show is an excellent example of how Parker and Stone are able to make a relevant statement about a serious national subject while retaining a scathing sense of humor.

"Trapped in the Closet" is the infamous episode that lampoons the Church of Scientology. Stan is believed to be the reincarnation of science-fiction writer and church creator L. Ron Hubbard. This causes an uproar in the Scientology community, and celebrities like Tom Cruise and John Travolta - both card-carrying Scientologists - come to celebrate the second coming of their prophet. However, when Stan hurts Cruise's feelings by saying his acting isn't as good as "that guy in Napoleon Dynamite," Cruise locks himself in Stan's closet and refuses to come out

At the episode's end, Stan says he can't be the new prophet, because Scientology is a global scam. This causes many church members, including Travolta and Cruise, to threaten to sue Stan for denouncing their religion.

The remainder of season nine is especially solid, and includes such gems as "Mr. Garrison's Fancy New Vagina," where teacher Mr. Garrison becomes Miss Garrison and, through plastic surgery, Kyle is turned into a tall black child and Kyle's father is turned into a dolphin; "The Losing Edge," in which the boys try to lose their little league games, so they don't have to have their summers tainted by baseball; and "Free Willzyx," in which the boys use Mexican Aeronáutica y Spacia Administración to send a "talking" whale to his home on the moon.

Overall, "South Park: The Complete Ninth Season" is an essential addition to any "South Park" DVD collection. Season 9 proves that, like a fine wine, "South Park" just gets better with age.

SO FAR, SO GOOD FOR SEASON 11

Wednesday, March 7, 2007, marked the beginning of the 11th season of "South Park." As creators Parker and Stone will admit, they think "South Park" gets better with each passing season. "We've really hit our stride this season," they often say during their DVD mini-commentaries.

Judging simply from the first five episodes of the season, I have no doubt Season 11 will be another hilarious and stellar outing for "South Park." The first episode of the run, "With Apologies to Jesse Jackson," was an especially excellent season opener. Stan's father, Randy Marsh, is in the bonus round of "Wheel of Fortune," and his clue is "People Who Annoy You" with the solved letters

"N_GGERS." Randy guesses the racial epithet, but the answer, it turns out, is "NAGGERS."

Randy tries desperately to redeem himself, but is constantly referred to as "the (n-word) guy." Parker and Stone manage to throw several curveballs in the episode, including Randy being chased by progressive rednecks who don't take kindly to racists. The episode manages to lampoon recent events and gets viewers to think about the connotations of out-group individuals using in-group words. It is the stupidly smart line that "South Park" always manages to walk.

Some other season highlights include the character of Butters being mistaken as bi-curious by his father and being sent to a reparative therapy camp where Butters can "Pray the gay away," and last week's Easter episode featuring "The Hare Club for Men," an ancient group that has guarded the secret of Easter and the Easter bunny for generations. Even though there have only been a few episodes aired, it appears that Season 11 is shaping up to be another strong run of shows.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, "SOUTH PARK"

When I first saw the cover story of Rolling Stone Magazine's March 22, 2007, issue "Still Sick, Still Wrong," which calls attention to the 10th birthday of "South Park," I immediately was filled with a sense of nostalgia. I remember following "South Park" since the seventh grade.

For the most part, I have kept with the show (except for about a year-and-a-half during seasons 6 and 7, when I didn't have a television), and my opinion of it has improved with every passing season. Once the show hit its stride around seasons 3 and 4, there has been no stopping Parker and Stone's comedic momentum.

The reason I love "South Park" is because the show is always shocking, offensive and surprising, but also smart, scathing and funny. It is a show that never takes itself too seriously, and its creators never show their true hands. One week Parker and Stone will make run of some right-wing nut, while the next week, they'll take on some crazy liberal.

According to the story in Rolling Stone, "South Park" usually is written on a Thursday, animated throughout the weekend and aired the following Wednesday, which allows the show to stay on top of current events. No subject is too taboo, and nothing goes too far.

"South Park" should be celebrated, because, even though it has spawned some truly stupid shows in its wake ("Family Guy" comes to mind), it has shown that shows don't have to be mature to make a point and don't have to be on a soapbox to spread a message. Parker and Stone have no problem satirizing current people and events or reveling in their juvenility. "South Park" gives its followers an outlet to watch what we are all thinking without all the guilt of actually saying it out loud.

Parents, Lafene act as reliable sources of information

By Robyn Russell

SEXUAL HEALTH AWARENESS PEER EDUCATORS

According to the National Center for Health Statistics, the percentage of teens ages 15 to 19 who have had sex is 47 percent for girls and 46 percent for guys.

Nineteen percent of women ages 15 to 44 use the pill as their primary method of contraception, while 15 percent of women ages 15 to 44 use condoms as their primary method.

Sex is everywhere - in movies, on television and in our music. It's no wonder men are rumored to think of sex every seven seconds (which, by the way is false).

With the current rate of contraceptive use and people of all ages engaging in sexual acts, information regarding sex is a hot commodity.

However, finding reliable information about sex can be easier said than done. If one has questions about sex, a close friend probably would be the first person to whom they would go. However, it's not always guaranteed the information will be reliable.

Sure, they might have some fascinating stories about their own sexual escapades, but as far as accurate information goes, one might wish to look elsewhere.

Can you go to your parents? Twenty men and 20 women were surveyed on the K-State campus, and a little more than half of each group said they felt comfortable talking to both of their parents about having sex.

What about those who don't feel comfortable talking to their parents? I've had friends tell me that even approaching the subject would be seen as a sin to their parents. What about questions like "How do I protect myself during sex?" and "Where can I find birth control?"

That's where Lafene Health Center and all of its resources come in. Lafene is a great place to go for all of your questions. Dedicated doctors and nurses are available and always willing to answer questions.

Lafene also has a clinic that provides health care specifically for women.

The Women's Clinic provides contraception options, sexually transmitted disease testing, examination and treatment for women along with STD counseling for men and women including HIV, pregnancy and health care issues.

The Health Promotion Department sponsors SHAPE, a peer education resource consisting of American Red Cross certified HIV/ AIDS and STD educators.

With all of the resources we have available to us at K-State, we are capable of being informed on how to protect ourselves and where we can go if we need help. It's just a matter of looking in the right places.

The Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators are always willing to answer questions, give presentations, or if you are interested in joining SHAPE, you can contact us at (785) 532-6595 or at shape@k-state. edu.

Sex Ed is a weekly column written by the members of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and edited by Carol Kennedy, director of health promotions at Lafene Health Center. If you would like SHAPE to answer your sexual health question, please contact SHAPE at shape@ksu.edu.

Departments offering new classes next year

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students looking to fill their schedules will have a few more classes from which to choose next semester.

Several colleges around campus will be bolstering course catalogs with new courses.

The Department of English, which has offered classes like Harry Potter's Library and '60s Civil Rights Literature, will add a class that will not just benefit English majors.

The department will offer two sections of written communication for the workplace this fall. Students are required to gain permission before enrolling.

"The idea of the course is that the students will be doing assignments that they will be doing in their jobs," said Phillip Marzluf, director of expository writing and associate professor of English.

Marzluf said the class will include students from the College of Human Ecology and various extensions of the College of Engineering.
